No Sex in the City

Big Ban Theory What do gambling, bare breasts and binge drinking have in common? Aside from a fun night out, they were doggedly censored by the New England Watch and Ward Society. Formed in the 1870s and prominent until the '50s, the society set out to slap anything it deemed inappropriate with a "Banned in Boston" label, from brothels and strip joints, to books and plays. (A practice that served to make the offending material even more coveted by the rest of the country.) Tufts professor Neil Miller unwraps the story in Banned in Boston. Hear all the dirty details on Sept. 21 at Brookline Booksmith. Kandace Cornell-Nadelberg

THE RAY TYE MEDICAL AID FOUNDATION

WE WILL NEVER STOP CARING

A LETTER FROM RWANDA

You have a nice welcome note when someone searches for your Foundation. It says

WE NEVER STOP CARING! WHEN YOU SAVE A LIFE YOU SAVE THE FUTURE.

Allow me to congratulate for this mission because you put it in practice, you do not only say it. Today, my objective is to thank you so much for paying my heart surgery.

Mr Tye with Erneste

I would like to be a doctor when I grow up and help other as you helped me. I wish to be a cardiologist, and I will like to come back to the United States for my college education.

I thank you once again for helping me and my God already blessed you.

Thanks.
Erneste.

Dear Erneste,

Thank you for your beautiful note.

YOU ARE THE FUTURE.

I hope that as you grow up you realize that helping someone else is the greatest mission you can have.

God bless you,

Ray Tye

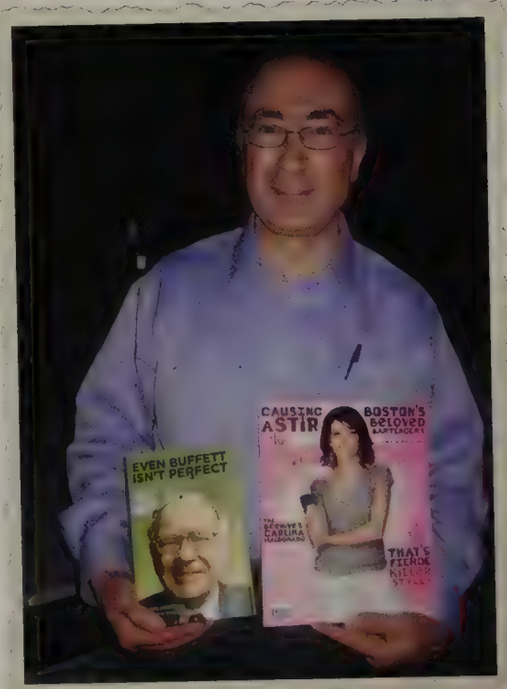
Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you went. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.



Desiree Cruz, Lauren Woodfill, Nancy Rosenlund, Dale Martin, Lynne Paulus and Jamie Lisagor (the editor's sis) went to the Galapagos Islands. "Wetsuits?" scoffed the local sea lions. "Who needs wetsuits when you can evolve 500 lbs of body fat?"

On a tour of the Baltic region, Dan Krechmer and Heather Lydon visited the Lutheran Cathedral in Helsinki, Finland. Of the thousands of Finns in the background, surprisingly not one was named Huckleberry.

Nico Kurlas, Kaisa Clark and Vanessa Parker climbed Table Mountain in Capetown, South Africa. Below, you can see Place-Setting Valley, the Flatware Coast and Napkin-Holder Rock.

Vahan Janjigian, chief investment strategist at "Forbes" magazine, liked our idea for an "Improper" IPO, but he thought all the blue-chip stocks might turn green with envy.

Last Scene Here { JONATHAN SOROFF }

WHAT I DID ON MY SUMMER VACATION (PART 1)

Jerusalem first captured my imagination when I went there as a five-year-old. What I remember from then is a camel ride, ice cream on demand, a few too many Bible stories, more Arabs than my parents generally had at their dinner parties and the King David hotel—one of the great, old grand hotels, where everyone from the Emperor Haile Selassie to my grandmother has stayed. (Fun fact: On the autograph hallway that runs the length of the lobby, Günter Grass is next to Metallica.)

I hadn't been there for over 20 years, but when we arrived, our room on the sixth floor offered the perfect diorama of the Old City—the gigantic Fabergé egg–like Dome of the Rock, peeking up over the fortifications built by Suleiman the Magnificent in the 1500s, the Jaffa Gate with its breach in the wall created in 1898 so that Kaiser Wilhelm II could enter in his carriage, etc., etc.

In all its storied, stony magnificence, the Old City hasn't changed much, and I was excited to see it again alongside my S.O., Sam. The first morning, we headed straight for the Western Wall—the holiest place in Judaism, where millions of notes to God are crammed into the cracks between the ancient bricks, amid a murmuring, bobbing, black-and-white sea of Jews praying fervently. Like Christian pilgrims have done since the Crusades, we traced the Via Dolorosa, where Christ dragged his cross, to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, where he's supposedly buried. We ate the best damn falafel I've ever tasted for lunch and had dinner accompanied by the first of many bottles of excellent Israeli wine.

It was hot—Biblically hot—as we toured the Jerusalem Archaeological Park. A layer cake of excavations, it includes an Ummayad palace courtyard, a Roman promenade littered with columns, Byzantine and medieval houses, and the ancient Hulda Gates. We had enough time to read War and Peace as we waited among a mob of sweaty tourists to climb up to the Temple Mount, the second holiest place in Islam. It's the site of the Al-Aqsa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock, which contains the stone where Muslims believe Mohammed was carried off to heaven on a white horse, and which Jews believe is the same stone where Abraham almost sacrificed Isaac. Unfortunately, Jews also believe it's directly above the remains of the second Temple, and standing above such a holy place is a decided No-No. That's a shame, because the mosque and the Dome are magnificent, but it's an even bigger shame that foreigners are no longer allowed inside—the contentiousness of religion and politics writ large.

Feeling our way through the maze of the Arab Quarter, we left the Old City to see the Garden of Gethsemane, where Jesus said his last prayers and at least eight of the olive trees are old enough to have heard him. We shopped in the souk in the Old City, and outside, at a shopping mall redolent of Rodeo Drive. The restaurant at the David Citadel Hotel ensured we were well-fed, and the bar at the Mamilla Hotel (along with two women from the U.S. Consulate) ensured we got blind drunk.

There was a day spent at Yad Vashem: The Holocaust Memorial, which, despite the horror of its subject matter, is the most beautiful building I've ever seen. It was designed by Cambridge-based architect Moshe Safdie, who seems to have designed everything in Jerusalem since the Ottoman Empire, except the YMCA. That was done by the guy who designed the Empire State Building. We spent an afternoon in Bethlehem, feasting on shawarma, seeing the Church of the Nativity and marveling that most Westerners are too afraid to visit because it's in the Palestinian Authority. A walk along the ramparts of the Old City to the Damascus Gate offered breathtaking views, and the ruins underneath offered a nice spot to cool off.

A lot of people—Israelis especially—are quick to dismiss Jerusalem as "the place where people do nothing but pray." Yet it's all that faith—on display in the people and preserved in the stones—that gives Jerusalem its powerful hold over me. Neither Sam nor I subscribe to a particular belief, but we both kept remarking how extraordinary it is to witness such religious conviction in others. That's why it was so funny when we boarded the El Al flight for home and were seated next to a teenage girl whom the stewardess asked to move. It turned out that the man she was trading seats with was an Orthodox Jew who couldn't be seated next to a woman on an overnight flight. "So it's OK for him to sit next to a gay couple?" I asked. And for the next 12 hours, he pressed himself against the window, his nose buried inside a copy of the Talmud. The irony of the situation made me think there must be a God. ✖✖✖

Greener Pastures

My first Boston apartment resembled a small train, providing less elbow room at our dinner parties than the Green Line during rush hour. Due to its size, my husband and I could have a conversation from opposite ends, using our backstage voices. I took it as a sign of our affection that we enjoyed living there. Admittedly, it helped that the rental unit had a decent deck. Our friends especially loved that deck, even though they had to walk through our bedroom to reach it and the view revealed a dank alley.

Eventually, we decided to move into a larger duplex. I'd describe its charms to our pals: Air conditioning! Washer and dryer! Two floors! "But does it have outdoor space?" they'd ask in turn. Apparently in Boston, where the weather sucks much of the year, outdoor space is the ultimate goal. More specifically, a roof deck, which was news to me (in Virginia, people fancied a fine porch and a steady place to rest their cocktails).

It only takes one good glimpse to make a convert, however. This issue features five of the city's most desirable gardens and terraces. With their bamboo-lined walls and boxwood shrubs, they look nothing like the ones brokers have shown me over the years. At a certain price point, "Wait until you see the roof deck" is real-estate code for "This place is a dump." No amenity is worth an inhuman smell—I have a diaper pail for that privilege—but outdoor space would be nice. And the slow crawl to Brookline begins.

Sweet Somethings

TO BEE

NOT MANY deluxe hotels welcome infestations, much less invite a resident swarm. The InterContinental Boston, however, has built a rooftop apiary, whose 40,000 residents produce honey for the treatments at the hotel's spa and for dishes at its brasserie, Miel. Sous chef Cyrille Couet, who's been collecting the first harvest, says, "Aside from the dessert part of the menu, honey marries very well with lemon in acidity." As for stings, Couet claims, "Bees aren't aggressive. I have the gear, but I barely wear it anymore."

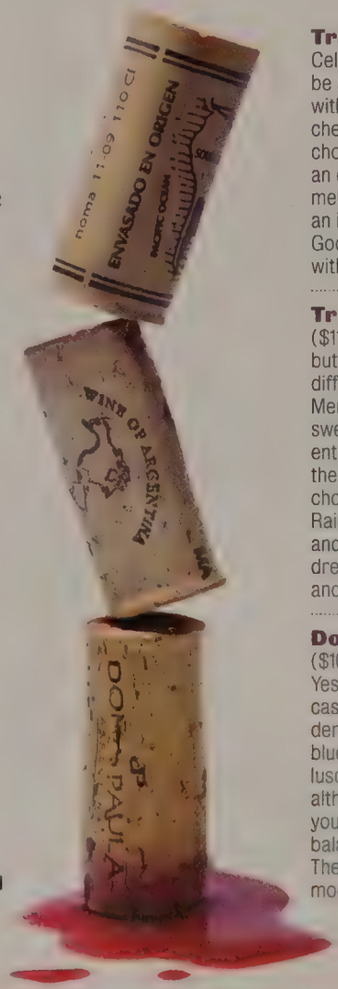
Good Eats

Worth a Crack



A few years after deviled eggs hatched a comeback, this two-bite bar snack has migrated onto local menus. Right at home with the lamb haggis, tomato bridie and other Scottish plates at the Haven in JP, the dish comes hard-boiled, packed in coarse-ground sausage, crisped in hot oil and split down the center to reveal a velvety yolk. The whole package might have breakfast-like appeal if not for the dollop of heady mustard (a mixture of Dijon and grainy) and well-dressed mesclun greens on the side. ELIZABETH BOMZE

MORE MALBEC

Argentina won't quit. Malbec from Mendoza is still the hottest growth category in the market, and it keeps chugging despite the lack of enthusiasm for most other imports. Why? It's spectacularly delicious and affordable. And that's a great formula for success in our current, er, recovery. Dry, arid, high-desert conditions, mountainous elevations, brilliant sunshine, ungrafted vines, naturally low yields and the ease of growing grapes without having to spray pesticides combine to make magic. A recent trip to the country, where I tasted a few hundred malbecs, yielded countless winners, including these three.

Trapiche Mendoza, 2008 ($9, Best Cellars, Boston). How could a wine possibly be any good at $9? This is a middleweight with a nice punch of licorice and black cherry, slightly peppery with a little chocolate accent to the fruit. Very solid for an everyday quaff (even a light chill), with mellow, low-tannin soft textures, there's also an intriguing coffee-bean quality in the finish. Good for what's left of barbecue season with some basic meat dishes.

Trivento Reserve Mendoza, 2008 ($11, Merit Liquors, Medford). Only $2 more, but what a step up in intensity! From four different estate vineyards in Lujan de Cuyo, Mendoza's major-league subzone, this has a sweet herb and cocoa aroma that's very enticing. The texture is velvety smooth and the flavors combine dried fruit and chocolate in an irresistible way, at least to a Raisinette addict like myself. Fresh, spicy and medium-to-full in style, this can be dressed down with burgers, or decanted and served with fancy cuts of steak.

Doña Paula Estate Mendoza, 2008 ($16, Cambridge Wine & Spirits, Cambridge). Yes, it's worth every penny of the extra cash! Doña Paula's estate wine is a stunner—dense and rich with heady aromas of blueberry, blackberry and violets. It has a luscious smoky vibrancy on the palate, and although the tannins are a bit higher than you might expect, the flavors are in such balance they're not in the least obtrusive. The finish is all signature dark, creamy mocha. Drink this with... anything!

A TASTE OF OAXACA

Diana Kennedy visits Boston.

AUTHENTICS Ramos and Kennedy

KNOWN AS THE JULIA Child of Mexican cuisine, Diana Kennedy first came to Boston years ago, at Child's behest, when she was launching her first cookbook. Now the distinguished octogenarian is launching her final book—Oaxaca al Gusto—and returning at the invitation of former student Erwin Ramos, chef/owner of Olé Mexican Grill.

Back in the early '70s, Kennedy recalls, "practically everything" was hard to find when shopping for ingredients. On Sept. 30, she and Ramos will hit area farmers' markets before Ramos prepares a multi-course Oaxacan meal using recipes from the book "that don't require exotic ingredients."

Like iguana, for example? Isn't there at least one iguana recipe in Oaxaca al Gusto? Yes, and it's a testament to Kennedy's commitment to authenticity that she includes such cuisine. Besides, "Isn't that fun?" she asks. "Well, do you want a trite little book or a grown-up book?"

We'd like a grown-up book, please.

TWO LOCALS will compete on the newest season of The Next Iron Chef: Mary Dumont of Harvest and Ming Tsai of Blue Ginger. On this installment, they'll face challenges such as cooking on a desert island.

MARK YOUR CALENDARS: Every Sunday through October, the SoWa Open Market on Harrison Avenue is featuring a rotating group of food trucks.

PAPA RAZZI has closed its Back Bay venue and is moving to the Newbury Street site of Bouchee.

Sites We Love

Katy Elliott, 31, a web editor for House & Garden and Domino, is the creator of katyelliott.com, a blog dedicated to the highs and lows of renovating her 260-year-old house in Marblehead.

Q: What's your style inspiration?

I'm really interested in English country style. A bit more proper than American country—filled with antiques, paintings, old rugs and floral textiles, but all a little scuffed around the edges.

Q: Ever consider being a contestant on Extreme Makeover: Home Edition?

Um, no. The show always makes me cry! We chose to buy this house in the condition that it was. It's an adventure, right? But I wouldn't turn down working with This Old House, hint hint.

Q: What do you love about old versus modern homes?

I love the history. How amazing is it that before the Declaration of Independence was even signed, my house was here? It's amazing to find old bottles and shoes in the walls and imagine the generations of families who lived here before us.

Q: What's one thing you hate to see when walking into someone's house?

A toilet bowl lined up in front of the bathroom door. If you're going to renovate a bathroom, switch around the plumbing if you can. A pretty vanity is so much nicer to see at the end of a hall.

HAYLEY MILLER

Going Out

House Rules

As Ms. Capulet pondered, "What's in a name?" Not too much, she figures out. In Brookline, the Abbey is named for a theater in general manager Damian Dowling's native Ireland. It's also just one out of many options that stuck. However, as co-owner/executive chef Josh Sherman notes, "The restaurant business is very theatrical. There's always some drama going on."

"I'D SAY AMERICAN BISTRO, BUT I DON'T EVEN KNOW WHAT THAT MEANS."

In this case, it's the story of two protégés striking out on their own—about 400 feet from where they started. Sherman cooked at the Washington Square Tavern for more than five years. Dowling tended bar there for eight. With their new place, the two are careful to set themselves apart. "We're not trying to be like the Tavern. We're not trying to be a beer bar like the Publick House across the street," says Sherman, who's a neighborhood fixture and apparently still popular with his competition. "All those people have been really helpful lending a hand."

The restaurant holds a 12-stool bar serving a lineup of house cocktails, while the 25 seats include a row of four by the pass, affording curious diners a direct, unedited view of Sherman in action. ("I'll have to watch myself," he confesses.) His menu stands in that ever-confounding ether of local, modern, traditional, upscale-pub-comfort grub. "If I had to put a label on it, I'd say American bistro, but I don't even know what that means," he concedes, refreshingly. Suffice to say, there will be small plates—like deviled bacon and eggs ($4)—accompanying dishes like charred Caesar salad ($8) and roasted cod with potato and scallion pancakes ($19.50).

As it opens this week, pop into the Abbey, if only to follow their former boss' example in telling them to break a leg. "He said, 'I didn't think you guys would work for me forever, and I wish you all the best,'" Sherman recounts. "Which is good, 'cause he's close."

Bugged Out

Boston ranks no. 11 on Terminix's list of the most-bedbug-infested cities. It's about time we got acquainted with our little house pets. LINH TRAN BRINCAT & ANDREW RIMAS

→ The first-known use of the word "bedbug" was in 1808. Before that, they were called, "God's Rightful Punishment on the Poor."

→ The Latin name Cimex lectularius means "bug of the bed." A close relative, Timex lectularius, means "inexpensive wristwatch."

→ A female can lay 200–500 eggs in her lifetime, although most of these are likely to be recalled.

→ Their favorite hiding spots are unobtrusive, suffocating spaces like mattress seams, baseboards, bed-frame cracks and comparative literature departments.

→ Because they're wingless, they can't jump, so they prefer to hitch rides on clothing, linens and very, very small pedicabs.

→ Before World War II, they were common in human dwellings, but were mostly eradicated in the 1940s thanks to pest-control products. Only since the late 1990s have they made a comeback, thanks to Gen X irony.

→ Bedbugs brood in dark places, feed off blood and are sexually unthreatening—making them popular with Twilight* fans.

BETTER OFF TRAD

TO THE MEN OF BOSTON AND EVERYWHERE ELSE: Chivalry has died. Since when does a woman have to pull out her wallet on a first date? What happened to escorting a woman across a busy street? Is it really that difficult to offer up a seat to a female on the T when she clearly would prefer to sit? Has the modern feminist movement made men immune to chivalry, old-fashioned values and treating a woman like a woman? What's next, marriage proposals via text message? Women: Stop acting like men. Men: A real man does open doors for a lady.

Looking for a gentleman

To the repulsive guy in the big, trashy truck and his girlfriend on Friday the 13th in the traffic lane adjacent to KFC in Allston:

Only a piece of trash like yourself with zero class would throw a cup of spit at a girl's car window. And to your laughing girlfriend: Only a very ugly girl like yourself would think this behavior is amusing. But then again, this is the only guy you can get looking the way you do. Sorry for both of you. Spit comes off a car window pretty easily. Being ugly on the inside and outside is for life.

Anonymous

To the adorable girl with the awesome leather jacket who consoled me in the ladies' room in McGreevy's:

Thank you! Your thoughtful words gave me a moment of empowerment after you heard me sobbing to my bestie about that "Jersey Shore–looking douchebag." You went out of your way to make me feel amazing about myself. It's always refreshing to receive advice from an outsider, but this one left a lasting impression.

This Just In

Besides bulbous heirloom tomatoes and just-dug potatoes, my weekly forage through the Brookline Farmers' Market usually includes a bunch of juicy purslane weeds, purple-streaked amaranth, mixed stir-fry greens and, when available, a bouquet of the bright blossoms from which summer squash sprout. These fleurs offer one of the most stunning examples of produce grown by the Hmong farmers in Lunenburg. They're delicate but (when very fresh) sturdy enough to stuff with creamy ricotta, dunk in a light batter and deep-fry until crisp.

PATCH WORK

Football has returned to Foxboro and Patriot Place, where Tastings Wine Bar and Bistro pays tribute to the season's favorite oblong. "Melons are a summer fruit, but locally, they're late summer, early fall," GM/beverage director Scott Shoer explains. "Last season, we didn't get them until November."

Tastings is licensed to sell cocktails at 11 am, so both tailgaters and locavores can indulge in some Sunday morning WATERMELON SMASHES ($11). Featuring bourbon, lemon juice and watermelon from Sharon's Ward's Berry Farm, the drink comes together thanks to the late addition of a secret weapon. "We tasted the cocktail, and I said, 'It's got sweetness, but it's the wrong kind of sweetness,'" Shoer recalls. "So chef says, 'Let me try this vanilla sugar,' and it was just money in the bank."

Another option combines vodka—infused with watermelon, honeydew and cantaloupe from Wrentham's White Barn Farm—with St-Germain and house sour mix ($11). Titled NICE & ICY MELONS, the evocation isn't subtle (and cries for a wool sweater). The taste, however, leaves more to the imagination. "I've found that melons and St-Germain create a really unique flavor that I can't describe," Shoer says. "As a wine guy, that embarrasses me."

But there's no shame in forgoing the parking-lot keg stands. Whether it's inside Gillette or at a comfortable level of lubrication, we all reach the same place.

THE WORKPLACE MYSTIQUE

Bringing feminine virtues to the job

THE PSYCHIC REALMS OF corporate men and women, according to psychologist Birute Regine, need to achieve better alignment. Feminism has swept the 50 successful ladies she's interviewed into positions of colossal power—a governor, a congresswoman, a former prime minister, a Pulitzer Prize finalist and a Nobel Laureate—so their discontents come from very high places. The "gladiator culture" dominates the masculine muscle of the work world, one that many women have had to endure, endangering their good, feminine virtues of empathy and relational awareness. They may "shape shift" to adapt or buckle on the too-stiff armor of the Amazon, jeopardizing what Carol Gilligan famously named their "different voice." These high-achievers report disturbing tales of rejection and abuse en route to power, but Regine imagines a paradigm reflecting both approaches: the "iron butterfly." Necessary toughness and grit can blend with holistic and spiritual ingredients, drawing on the Goddess and New Age connectivity. One woman, cruelly dissed, brought a knife and a handkerchief to a meeting to illustrate two available responses; she got her softer message across. ✖✖✖

FROM PAGE 273: "When Donatella ran into a wall of resistance, she did what Iron Butterflies do. She planted a vine. The vine grew. It bore fruit. And as its roots crawled under the wall, the wall weakened and fell. By wedding her vulnerability to collective power, she cultivated a force more powerful than a hammer; the gentle persistence of feminine presence."

CLIFF NOTES

Chef Marco Suarez stakes his claim in Dorchester with Ledge.

LEDGE YOUR BETS Don't miss the double-rib pork chop.

DORCHESTER HAS COME into its own as a dining destination. Chris Douglass pioneered the delicious development with Ashmont Grill in 2005. His Tavolo followed three years later. Most recently, Marco Suarez, who made Bon Savor my favorite stop in JP, decamped for this new frontier to head the kitchen at Ledge. Opened last summer, the restaurant seats more than 200 but has the feel and ambiance of a neighborhood joint, where families and friends can enjoy large portions and cheerful, attentive service.

The varied menu covers its bases, and almost everything we tried was first-rate. The calamari ($10), flash-fried to perfect crispness, was kicked up a notch with tempura-like slices of chili peppers. Clover honey contributed an unexpected but marvelous nuance to the spicy chicken wings ($10). Three arancini ($11) in a balsamic reduction made an intensely flavorful dish. A large pizza ($14) would've profited from a few extra minutes in the oven, but its copious toppings of house-made, fennel-spiked pork sausage, peppers and cheese more than compensated for the undercooked crust. Only the clam chowder ($6) disappointed with its floury thickness and bland flavor, but it was soon forgotten as the kitchen sent out a surprise intermezzo of exquisite cold-crab soup enlivened with habañero peppers.

Main courses matched the appetizers in vibrant flavors and toothsome textures. Grilled scallops ($24) brought four sizable, silky specimens, their delectable flavor marked by a hint of sweetness. Juicy roasted chicken and dumplings ($17) featured crisp, golden-brown skin. The dense, starchy dumplings were only overshadowed by the superlative summer beans and savory roasted red peppers. Steak frites ($21) was everything required of this bistro staple: a generous cut of full-flavored beef, resilient but not chewy, accompanied by hot, crisp fries and a piquant horseradish and chive-cream sauce.

Garlicky spinach shared a ramekin with a marvelous slab of firm-fleshed haddock ($17) baked with tarragon, chervil, shallots, garlic, butter and white wine. Finally, the pork chop ($18) nearly startled me with its heft at two-inches thick. Expertly seared, the behemoth was pink and succulent. Tasty whipped potatoes and tender haricots verts were worthy company, the beans far from the perfunctory nod many kitchens give to vegetable garnishes.

Excellent fruit desserts hit the spot at the end of a fine meal: a large, suitable-for-sharing bowl of strawberry, blueberry and peach cobbler, and a lemon tart ($8 each). Wine selections by the glass included Kim Crawford's sauvignon blanc ($12) from New Zealand's Marlborough region, with pleasant acidity and overtones of grapefruit, and a Mulderbosch rosé from South Africa ($7), a well-balanced quaff with slight effervescence. For reds, Tilia malbec ($27) from Argentina was a bargain bottle and a nice complement to the beef and pork.

On our first visit we drove, and I asked the hostess how far the restaurant is from the Ashmont station. Indulging in a little poetic license, she responded, "Three or four blocks." On our second visit we took the T, and it turned out to be closer to two miles. Following dinner, as we contemplated the trek back to the train, one of my dining companions remarked, "The distance is relative—it depends on the quality of the food. This was worth the walk." ×××

H TO THE G

Programming ideas to take HGTV to the next level.

Read more at improper.com/blogs

I'VE LEARNED A LOT FROM watching Home and Garden Television. For instance, instead of buying a coat rack, you can just get an old door. Then simply strip, sand and prime it. Sand it again, then paint and glue mirrors to it, drill holes for the hooks, screw in the hooks, get a studfinder and laser level, mark the wall and anchor the door using heavy self-tapping lag screws. Voilà! Your foyer just went from drab to fab in less than 37 hours!

Oh, there's more. Thanks to Income Property, I know how to remodel my basement so that some creep can live down there. Holmes on Homes taught me everything I know about fashion, which is why you'll never catch me without my overalls, gold chain and tank top. And from Property Virgins, I've learned that many first-time buyers have less self-awareness than a manatee in a shipping lane. "What were these people thinking with this wallpaper!" the property virgin will gasp, while apparently forgetting that she sleeps in a bed with stuffed animals at her parents' house.

Obviously, I watch a lot of TV—a lot of HGTV. So naturally, I have some ideas for the programming lineup. Don't get me wrong; HGTV already has a lot of great shows, like Bang for Your Buck, which features psychic women who reveal exactly how much value a remodeled room will retain when the home is sold at some future date. That's quite a talent. But there's always room for improvement, which is why I humbly offer the following all-new concepts.

Unrealistic Projects With Ezra's Parents: In this show, people with no carpentry skills will begin ambitious remodeling projects. Will they call a professional contractor before the new bathroom looks like an especially disturbing Salvador Dalí painting? No, they won't.

Bedbug Bonanza: Top designers remodel bedrooms to make stylish use of bedbug infestations.

Horrible, Horrible, People Shop for Condos: I'm sorry, they've already got this one. It's called Selling New York.

Mighty Mantown With Butch Teste: Host Butch Teste helps homeowners design personalized "mantowns," with fun and imaginative features such as big-screen TVs, custom poker tables and mistress' quarters.

Will they call a professional contractor before the bathroom looks like an especially disturbing Salvador Dalí painting? No, they won't.

Fantastic Foyers: Do you think a foyer is just a weird non-room that sort of leads to other rooms? Well, you're wrong. Watch as we up the antechamber with the wildest foyer makeovers you can possibly imagine. Chandeliers? Sure.

Real-Estate Investing with Chamillionaire: Rapper Chamillionaire shows what happens when you spend two chamillion dollars on a Houston mansion and then walk away from the payments. Hint: You still get to keep your cars!

The 1,000-Pound Contractor Who Didn't Know She Was Pregnant: Let's steal some of TLC's thunder.

Property Sluts: A show about people who've signed a few purchase-and-sale agreements, if you know what I mean.

Staging Your House to Sell It to Aliens: Don't let your house languish on the market once the aliens land. Start staging it now, with alien-savvy touches like neutral colors, tasteful sconces and the ceiling-mounted face-toilets that such buyers demand.

Watching Paint Dry: Will this paint ever dry? There's only one way to find out.

Rent or Buy?: Each week, a team of real-estate experts helps one lucky subject decide whether to buy a home or rent one. Factoring in historical data, tax implications and opportunity cost, the experts will dramatically reveal the answer: You're totally screwed either way. ✖✖✖

The Dance { JOHN D. SPOONER }

BEWARE OF GENIUS

Take street smarts over graduate degrees.

EXPERIENCE HAS TAUGHT me to pay much more attention to people with street smarts than with academic pedigrees. In college, I never spoke to a single professor. I felt way too stupid to waste their time. This isn't false modesty. I was allowed to waive second-year algebra in high school and enroll in an art course. The school agreed there was no sense in my flunking algebra since I'd probably never have a career that required knowledge of math. Ah, the accidental nature of life. Accidental in that I was pushed into the investment business, only to discover after several years that it was mostly about human nature, not math.

Warren Buffett is arguably the best investor of the past 50 years. Sure, he's gifted, and can rip apart balance sheets and income statements. But his real brilliance is his common sense. Three of his biggest holdings are Procter & Gamble, American Express and Coca-Cola. He holds his investments generally for years, not months and weeks. Why are these companies favorites? Procter & Gamble produces products you use and throw out and need to buy again: soap, razor blades. American Express gets you goods, entertainment and travel through their high-end credit cards. Coca-Cola sells you Coke and other consumer brands. Their reach is global. Common sense on Buffett's part.

Contrast this simple approach with many economists. One of the biggest hedge funds in the world imploded in 1998, to the tune of $4.6 billion, and threatened the stability of financial markets. The hedge fund employed computer-generated Gantt programs, orchestrated in part by two directors, both winners of the Nobel Prize for economics. The Federal Reserve had to come to the fund's rescue to prevent systemic chaos.

Some years ago, another Nobel Prize–winning economist rented the beach house next door to ours. He looked professorial with rumpled hair, not quite like Einstein, but close. He dressed as if his clothes came straight from the laundry pile, and he put them on in the dark. He was sweet despite always seeming lost in mathematical dreams. I often watched him approach his house, a slow shuffle to an outside deck, one step up from the ground. Every time he went to step up, he tripped on the step. Every time. He also made the mistake of asking for my help raising several windows and opening wine with an old-fashioned corkscrew. He smiled at me and shook his head as if ordinary routines of life were beyond him. "He doesn't know if he's afoot or on horseback," I said to my wife. "And I was afraid to talk to professors? The emperor's new clothes."

This observation has been underscored for me many times when we've been at academic dinners or cocktail parties. At these gatherings, I've never heard one word by anyone on sports, novels, TV, movies, the stock market, or families. I've only heard discussions of politics, op-ed issues, institutional gossip and backstabbing. The real stuff of life—our daily concerns, fears and joys—went ignored.

My recent case of being careful about assumed genius took place right before the economic meltdown three years ago. I was invited to a small dinner, hosted by two directors of a public company. They wanted to introduce new, potentially significant clients to the firm as it expanded services in the city. I sat next to two other guests, the CEO of a bond mutual-fund company and the president of a large real-estate empire. After a five-course dinner, the two directors did a dog-and-pony show, smug, sure of themselves, convinced they knew more about everything than anyone in the room. Both directors had been in Washington in their careers, almost at cabinet level. Insiders. They went on like Frick and Frack about the wondrous job the firm was doing. One of my new friends, the real-estate mogul, handed me a folded piece of paper. I opened it. He'd written, "Neither of these guys would know an ordinary American if they tripped over one."

Greed and stupidity, masked as intellectual brilliance, too often sink the ship.

What I'm preaching here is that so-called genius helped to get us into this economic mess. Just months after this fancy dinner, the parent company of the two speakers plunged 80 percent in price, partly on the enormous leverage put on its balance sheet. Greed and stupidity, masked as intellectual brilliance, too often sink the ship. Take common sense and street smarts over graduate degrees as you wend your way through a world that increasingly wants to complicate, not simplify.

Of course, you also have to be a judge of character as people enter your life. Guard yourself, and your money, by asking questions. You want to discover if these Mensa types actually ever worked with real folks. Consider asking, "What jobs did you have in the summers in high school and college?" Also, "Did you ever have to make a payroll, paying employees in a business you ran?" And maybe the most important, "What have you learned from the failures you've had in life, the times you screwed up?" These questions will personalize the brilliant ones. They'll get the geniuses down from their high horses. And, if the answers aren't forthcoming... don't buy it. Or them. ×××

The School of Sports {RICH LEVINE}

ON MOSS, MARONEY, MORRISON AND MIAMI

3 Pats Pieces

Kool-Aid Man (2006–2010) It was sad to see Laurence Maroney go, mostly because of all the time I wasted believing that he'd turn it around. But even sadder is the fact that I still believe. I wouldn't be the least bit surprised if he makes something of himself in Denver. Then again, I'm the same guy who hasn't given up on Gerald Green.

The Moss Mess I feel awful for Randy Moss. I honestly do. Have you ever seen a player so publicly beg a team to offer him a contract? I'm starting to seriously worry that this will turn ugly. What happens when it's Week 12 or 13 and the offer still hasn't come in?

Regronkulous I can't remember the last time I was this excited about a Pats offensive rookie. Actually, I can. It was Laurence Maroney (forget I mentioned it). Inane ramblings aside, I'm calling 10 touchdowns this season for Rob Gronkowski. One for every letter.

2 BRUINS BREAKDOWNS

Power to Patrice It's a big year for Patrice Bergeron. As a player, sure, but maybe just as much as a mentor. Every young star needs a veteran to look up to, learn from and lean on. And despite the fact that Bergeron's only 25, he's assumed that mentor role with Tyler Seguin. Can't say I'm worried about how Bergie will do. At least he'll be a better mentor than Constanza.

Cut the Czech I love the idea of teams spending training camp abroad. As we saw with the C's in 2007, a trip like that can work miracles for chemistry. But as we also learned with the Sox in 2008, starting the actual season overseas can be a huge pain in the ass. The B's open the season in Prague on Oct. 1.

REVISITING 5 RED SOX PREDICTIONS

(I MADE THEM BEFORE THE SEASON. JUDGE AWAY.)

You Will Be Frustrated OK, so I wasn't exactly going out on a limb here, but in the end, the frustration wasn't exactly what I predicted. I figured it'd be the puny lineup and shaky bullpen that drove us nuts. Instead, it was the kind of frustration that only comes from watching the clubhouse deteriorate into an intensive care unit. And still, JD Drew remains unscathed!

Clay Buchholz Will Win at Least 13 Games This one was a little riskier, which seems ridiculous after the season Buchholz turned out. But either way (not that he had a lot of competition), Clay's emergence is an unrivaled bright spot in an otherwise overcast season. I'm ready to give him the ball next Opening Day. (Should I mention how many times I predicted the Sox would trade him? No? Good.)

Adrian Beltre Will Exceed Your Expectations Not to pat myself on the back, but I nailed this one like it was a Hideki Okajima curve ball. It's just a shame that Beltre's year-long laser show was wasted on such a subpar Sox season. Although I doubt it'll make much difference this winter when AB gets paid like he's Elin Nordegren.

This Will Be Jonathan Papelbon's Last Season So I've got three wins so far. Can we call this one a tie? Because right now we can't be sure. If I had to guess again, I'd say Paps comes back for one more season; that's just a hunch. There's something about him and Daniel Bard teaming up that has me feeling good. But you won't hear many complaints if Bard gets the call to close in 2011.

The Sox Will Win the Wild Card Balls. I said that they'd succeed because of Lester, Beckett and Lackey. Turns out, they failed thanks to the latter two. Oh well. (By the way, good luck finding the file that proves I ever wrote that. It pays to be Facebook friends with Shaq's old I.T. guy).

1 AND ONE MORE THING

Were you surprised to see the C's bring ADAM MORRISON in for a workout? I'm not sure how you could be. Nothing's a surprise anymore. At this point, the idea of Morrison warming the bench makes sense. It's about time this city had a good crustache.

4 DATES TO WATCH

9/23: Basketball's FIBA World Championship for Women tips off in the Czech Republic. Sasha Vujacic will be the NBA's lone representative this time around.

10/1: The Ryder Cup gets under way in Newport, Wales, where Tiger will adopt a new pickup line: "Got a little captain's pick in ya?"

10/3: The Sox season comes to an end, but don't mind all those open seats at Fenway.... It's still a sellout! OK, I take it back. It's against the Yankees.

10/4: The Pats take their talents to South Beach for a Monday night showdown with the Dolphins. Meanwhile, I officially beat the "taking talents to South Beach" joke into the ground.

ISSUE DATE: October 6

"I tend to go for a lot of grays with a pop of color."

Soroff On TANIYA NAYAK

The HGTV interior designer talks about clutter, open kitchens and Boston's biggest decorating error.

BORN IN INDIA AND RAISED IN WEYMOUTH, home-decor star Taniya Nayak is the daughter of a prominent architect. Nayak, 37, earned a master's degree in interior design from Boston Architectural College before landing her first TV gig on ABC Family's Knock First. She moved to HGTV's FreeStyle and Designed to Sell before debuting her own show, Destination Design. She's also a regular on HGTV programs like Showdown and Bang for Your Buck. Her eponymous firm has created commercial spaces such as Felt, BarLola and the new Petit Robert Central, while residential clients include celebrities like Desperate Housewives' Jesse Metcalfe and Aerosmith's Joe Perry. (Nayak was also one of The Improper's "Beloved Bartenders" in 2001.) She and her husband, Brian O'Donnell, live in the Boston area.

Jonathan Soroff: Were you one of those kids who was always drawing houses?
Taniya Nayak: I was always drawing people. I thought I was going to be a fashion designer.

Still have any ambitions along those lines?
No, I got over that. But I do have this weird desire to be a hairstylist. I have this delusion that I'm good with scissors, and I've cut a few people's hair. It's been a complete disaster. Before I appeared on Oprah last year, I felt the need to give myself a quick snip snip, but I ended up giving myself a total mullet just before going on the biggest show of all time.

What's the one thing people waste the most money on in decorating?
I think people don't spend their money wisely, like going for really high-end finishes, when no one even notices the difference. Countertops with fancy, beveled edges?

Decorator you idolize?
I love Ian Schrager. I think my personal style is really masculine. Very simple, very clean lines, modern. I tend to go for a lot of grays with a pop of color. My personal style is very different than what you see on the shows.

What's the single, biggest fix for a tired room?
Clean it! Seriously, clutter. Get rid of that. And besides that, paint it.

Is it hard to make an interior look good on TV?
I can make anything look good. [Laughs.] But on television, you have to consider the direction they're shooting from and using colors that look [good] on camera.

Would Ty Pennington sleep with me?
He'd be a fool not to. But he's straight. And he's too skinny for me. You also seem way calm, and he's so over the top. Do you really want to wake up in the morning with that megaphone in your ear?

Is there a cheap way to reupholster furniture?
Do it yourself for something simple like a headboard, but otherwise, hire someone. Know when to say when and bite the bullet.

Crate and Barrel or Restoration Hardware?
I love Crate and Barrel. It's fun; the colors are very exuberant. Restoration Hardware is very restrained and sophisticated, and I like a little whimsy in a space.

Most important piece of furniture in a house?
The bed. You spend so much time there, and there's so much you can do with it.

Hardest room to decorate?
Kitchen and bathrooms are tough because [of] stone and tile and appliances, so it gets costly. It takes a lot of labor.

How do you feel about being called a designer versus a decorator?
As a designer, you're dealing a little bit more with codes, structural things and numbers. With decorating, it's also a science of color and texture and fabrics and layout.

Biggest decorating mistake people make?
You know what I see in Boston, especially, a lot? People block their fireplaces with a sofa or a chair. I find that really strange, even if it's not working. Put candles or a plant in it for cryin' out loud. Other than that, people don't measure first and things end up not fitting.

Biggest decorating nightmare you ever had?
I had one person on Designed to Sell who was so disingenuous, and I could tell they had no real intention of selling their house. They were so particular, standing over my shoulder the whole time, and it was a complete scam.

Who would win a Jell-O wrestling match: Oprah or Nate Berkus?
Oprah! [Laughs.] I adore Nate Berkus, but Oprah is a powerhouse.

Is Martha Stewart a taste Nazi?

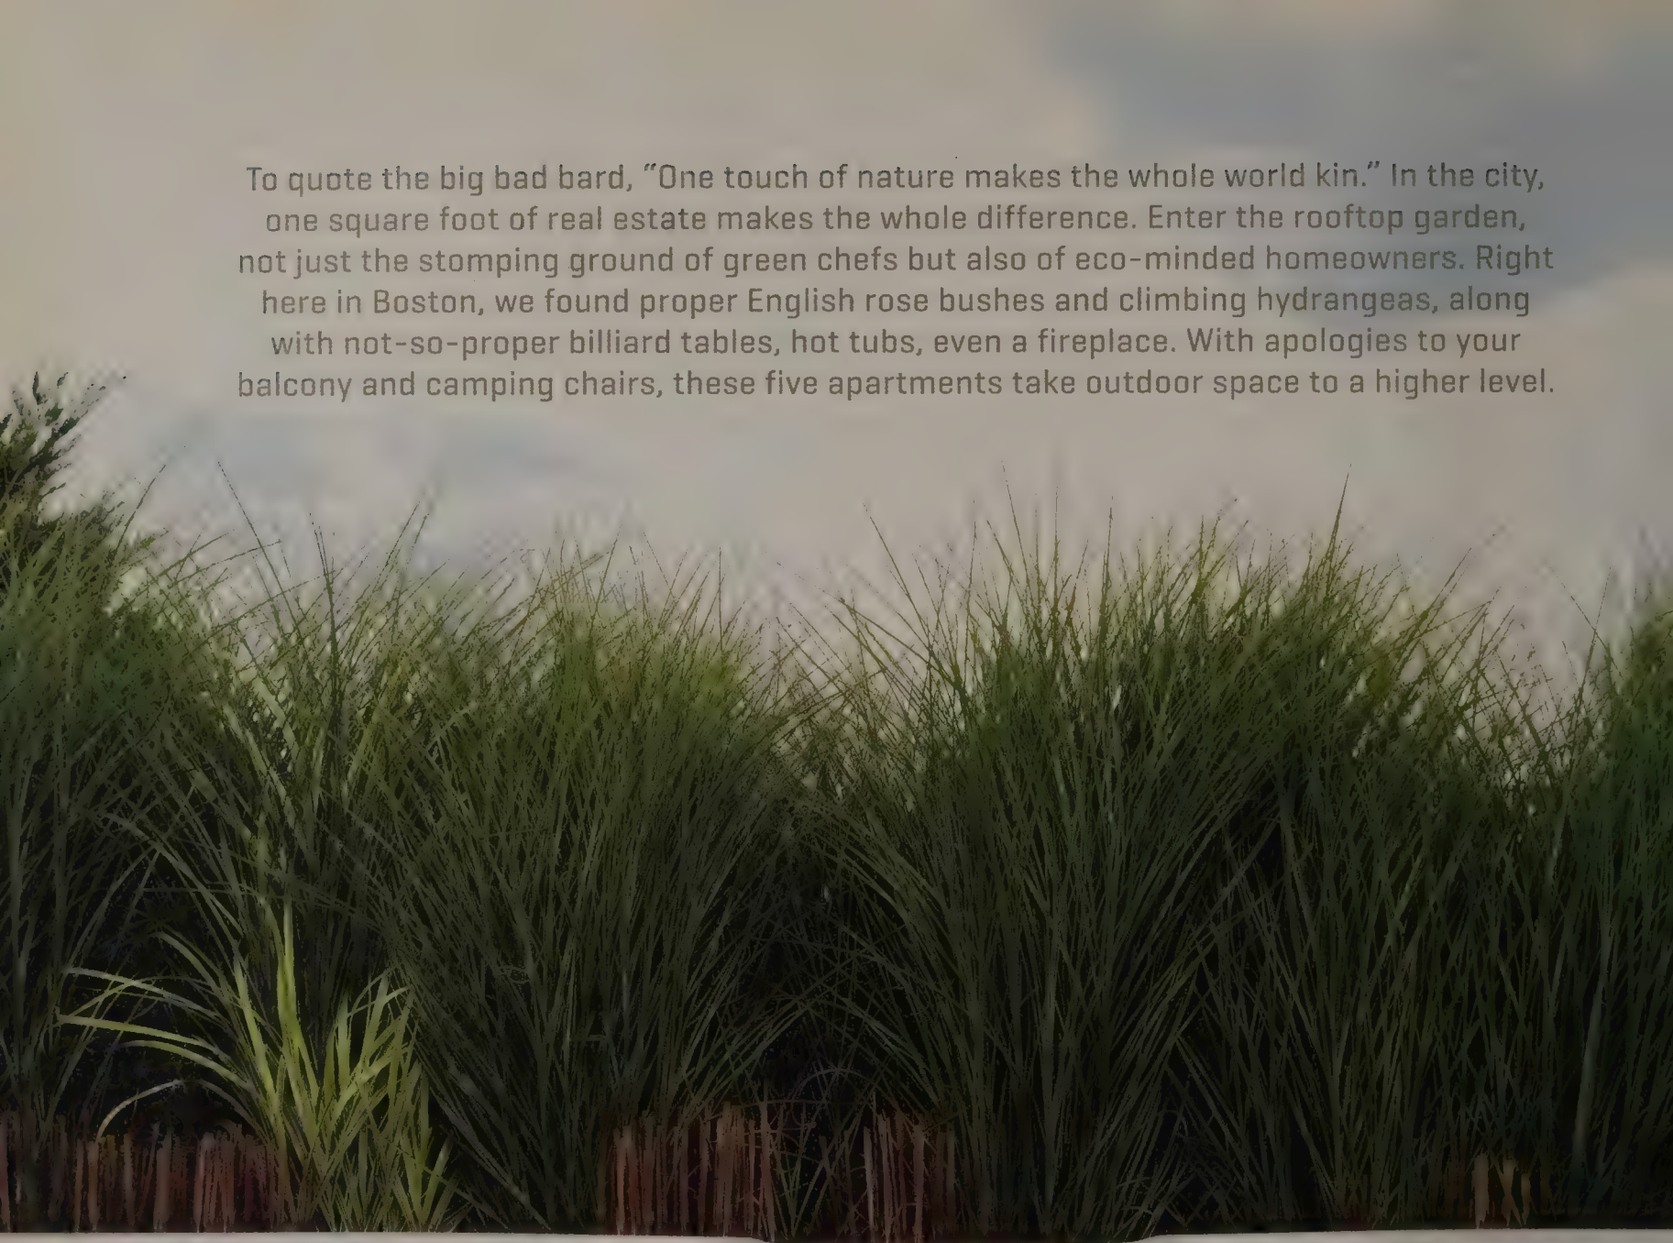
Do you go around the house fluffing pillows?
I'm not that fussy. Crooked artwork on the wall, I'll straighten out, but when I go into a room, I look for what's good in it, not what needs improvement.

Are you highly caffeinated?
One of my contractors once said that he thought I was a white girl who turned brown from drinking so much coffee. [Laughs.]

How much inspiration do you take from your Indian heritage?
I have an appreciation for some of the bolder, jewel-tone colors, but a lot of what I got from my dad is very spare, contemporary and modern. I grew up in a stark, white house.

Do you think people are too afraid of color?
No. I think, if anything, they're too bold and get into trouble. There's a trick to using color, but I err on the side of caution and tell people to use more subtle, neutral colors and save louder colors as accents.



Your dream design project?
A dream job for me would be a Las Vegas nightclub. Or a strip club. [Laughs.] You'd have the freedom to be tacky.

Why do people end up in kitchens at parties?
That's where the food is. It's the heart of the home. It's warm. It's cozy. That's why I say knock down the walls and make an open kitchen.

Last question: Will you fix up my deck?
If you mix up some good cocktails, of course! Oh, and we need a hunky carpenter. xxx

To quote the big bad bard, "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin." In the city, one square foot of real estate makes the whole difference. Enter the rooftop garden, not just the stomping ground of green chefs but also of eco-minded homeowners. Right here in Boston, we found proper English rose bushes and climbing hydrangeas, along with not-so-proper billiard tables, hot tubs, even a fireplace. With apologies to your balcony and camping chairs, these five apartments take outdoor space to a higher level.

SECRET GARDENS

ROOFTOPS GONE GREEN

WASHINGTON STREET, SOUTH END
The owners of this penthouse inherited a 2,500-square-foot deck designed for the wild at heart. Four-foot-high patches of Japanese silver grass, black-bamboo-lined walls, a Bloodgood Japanese maple tree, gray junipers and boxwood shrubs welcome visitors into a botanical safari, complete with a hot tub to soothe those trekking feet. GARDENER: LITTLE LANDSCAPES

CHESTNUT STREET, BEACON HILL

Wowed by this townhome's rustic flair, the owners also loved the sleek, modern feel of the rooftop deck. Judge Skelton Smith, a Beacon Hill architecture firm, saw the space as the perfect opportunity to play with height and scale—flowering crab-apple trees nestled among delicate geraniums, English ivy and vinca then couched in weathered, cedar planters. Green, white and simple, the deck is an elegant Eden. ARCHITECT: JUDGE SKELTON SMITH

COMMONWEALTH AVENUE, BACK BAY
A fortress of greenery shelters this townhouse roof from everything but the stars. Gardener Amanda King nurtures hornbeam and privet hedges in sleek, metal containers, as well as blue hydrangeas, hot-pink Knock Out roses and Japanese lilac trees. It all creates a spa-like oasis just begging for a stealth massage. GARDENER: AMANDA KING FROM R.P. MARZILLI

BEACON STREET, BEACON HILL
This terrace view could inspire great displays of fireworks. The gardeners at Winston Flowers showcase their flair for the lush and gorgeous with an all-green roof saturated with assorted sedum and succulents, and planters brimming with pink impatiens and purple salvia. A hot tub, outdoor kitchen and fireplace await this family's lucky party guests—for the Fourth of July or any occasion. LANDSCAPER: WINSTON FLOWERS

MARLBOROUGH STREET, BACK BAY

Billiards, anyone? Planned by the Sudbury Design Group and constructed by Woodmeister Master Builders, this English countryside–meets–South Beach pad pits wild blue salvia, Globe blue spruces and an espaliered smoke tree against orange umbrellas and chic black-and-ecru striped chaises. Sip tea, shoot pool, salsa dance—every jet-setting fantasy can come true here. LANDSCAPER: SUDBURY DESIGN GROUP

HOUSE Calls

REAL-ESTATE AGENTS SEE IT ALL.

BY NICK ALTSCHULLER | ILLUSTRATIONS BY ROXIE VIZCARRA

"OH GOD, I HOPE HE'S NOT DEAD." Not exactly the words you expect to hear when looking at an apartment.

My college roommate and I were moving to Boston in a few weeks. This was the second day of our search, our fifth viewing and what looked like my first corpse.

Our broker was unfazed. As we—two red-blooded boys at the height of our virility—huddled by the doorway, our elderly guide, a woman just taller than a yard stick and twice as thin, entered the room.

The blinds were drawn, but enough of the midafternoon sun crept in to illuminate her steady tiptoe toward the bloated figure lying on the kitchen floor. In the gloom, we watched her lean over and set her ear near the body's gaping mouth...

"No, he's alive. Come on in."

And so we hurdled over the sleeping giant to view the rest of the place: its stained, high-traffic carpeting, the walls daubed with cigarette smoke. Behind one accordion door, we found the official renter, apparently a male model with a bit of a drug problem. He lifted his head from his pillow and waved a weak hello. We waved good-bye. A few days later, we signed the lease.

Drugs, guns, chains and other implements of sexual deviance—all in a day's work for real-estate agents. For every titillating house-hunting story of yours, they have countless tales collected over the years. What follows is the pick of those comic gems. While instinct tells you to laugh at their misfortune, just remember: They haven't come to your door, yet. →

I WENT TO SHOW this South End condo to a mother and daughter. Showing the unit was always easy as the seller didn't live there. So I never called him ahead of time.

He forgot to tell me that he was letting his cousin stay there for a couple of weeks. I arrived with these buyers around 11 am, and I opened the door (without ringing the bell) to find this naked guy sitting in the living room eating cereal. He was very polite and even offered us a bowl.

I WAS SELLING A UNIT in the South End. This buyer comes with his agent and totally loves it, but he wants to see it at night. A few days later, we meet in the evening. He decides he wants to see it early in the morning. So I show them the unit at 6 am. He loves it!

He asks if he can buy the furniture as part of the deal—all of it. My client says yes. So we spend a few hours cataloging what he wants. And he and his agent put the offer together.

We negotiate for a couple of days and come to an agreement. Now the lawyers are working on the Purchase and Sale. The day to sign comes, and he disappears. Never to be seen or heard from again. Not even by his own agent or lawyer. Weird.

MY FIRST YEAR in real estate was 1999, and I was jacked up because I had my first potential sales listing. My boss and I go to this basement condo in Allston to give our valuation.

I really didn't think much of it at first, but the "living room" looked to be set up like a waiting room. We went into the bedroom, and it was painted black, which was strange. But things really got weird when we opened up the closet and found every sex toy, whip and chain known to man hanging on the walls. Then I noticed some sort of swing hanging in the corner.

"That was a large pile of guns."

You could chalk this up to the tenants being a bit on the "experimental side," but the kicker was when I went back into the living room. On each end of the table was a clipboard with stacks of a particular document. I picked one up and couldn't believe what I was reading. It was a legal release indemnifying the "School for Naughty Boys" for any physical harm (and this form was specific and graphic) that may result from a customer's affiliation with the "school."

PS: In that market, I think it still sold at full asking price on day one.

I SHOWED AN APARTMENT to two younger girls who were with their parents. Piles of pornographic movies were all over the floors and tables. Upon further inspection, many other items in the apartment were of an adult nature. I led my nonplussed clients into the bathroom, ostensibly to check the water pressure. When I pulled back the shower curtain, we were greeted by a life-size rubber dildo suctioned waist-high to the back wall of the shower. I mumbled something about it being an unconventional washcloth hook and shoved my clients out the door.

IMAGINE THE EXCITEMENT of a buyer finding his or her dream home—a 3,000-square-foot farmhouse on five acres just outside Boston at a very reasonable price. But here's where the excitement ends.

Walking through the threshold of this house was akin to being slapped in the face with a wet diaper, as the stench of almost 100 cats had us gasping for breath. Still determined to see it, we pressed on. In room after room, hundreds of glassy eyes peered down at us from every corner. It wasn't the cats, but a truckload of porcelain dolls stretching as far as we could see.

Despite the conditions, my buyer elected to make an offer. While I was away, a fellow agent was kind enough to cover the home inspection. But after just a few minutes of trailing the inspector, she couldn't take it anymore. Out the door she flew and up came her lunch. The buyer canceled the contract, and I owed my fellow agent big-time!

THIS PAST AUGUST, we set out with a young, professional couple and their spry grandmother, who was visiting for the day, to search through the remains of available units in Mission Hill. We had confirmation from existing tenants that it was OK to show the units and went on our way, keys in hand. Well, poor grandma certainly got a taste of what the young 'uns are up to these days.

Stop 1: Blacked-out windows, pizza boxes and beer bottles on the floor, and a half-clad couple surprised in bed during an affectionate afternoon embrace.

Stop 2: Occupants were awake, but their senses were not as the unmistakable smell of pot smoke billowed from one of their surprised mouths and the "water pipe" they had just used.

After seeing this, grandma decided she'd better chip in so her grandson and his girlfriend could up their price range.

I SHOWED AN APARTMENT to a young man who was very excited at the prospect of moving in with his fiancée. He was doing the preliminary legwork, narrowing the list of apartments down before she came to look. He spent a lot of time in one apartment looking at the current tenant's personal effects: pictures, notes on the fridge, etc. I later found out that his fiancée was in many of the photos, and the scribbles on the refrigerator were love notes in her handwriting. Nice way to find out your fiancée has a boyfriend!

I CALLED THE CURRENT occupant prior to showing an apartment. When I arrived, I knocked and thought I heard someone reply, "Come in." I let the client and myself in and found the male tenant lying naked on the couch. He jumped up and charged at the door, slamming it shut on the two of us. I apologized through the door while he shouted at me in what sounded like French. As we turned to leave, the tenant yanked the door back open, still naked except for a small washcloth in front of his groin. He continued to scream at me, and I continued to yell at him, "I don't speak French, I don't speak French. Please calm down. I can't understand you." His response, "I'm speaking English." Then he slammed the door closed.

THIS STORY IS WHAT happened my first day on the job. I scheduled an appointment to show a gentleman three apartments near Porter Square. We got into the car, and the first place I showed him was a studio. My boss most likely figured I knew the difference between a studio and a one-bedroom. I learned on the appointment, embarrassingly. This guy needed a one-bedroom. I was looking stupid.

Pot smoke billowed from their mouths.

Then I couldn't get the key to turn at the second place. It was about 90 degrees, and at that point I was drenched in sweat. A more senior agent could've gotten the key to work.

We arrived at the third place, which was on the top floor of a handsome Victorian building. It was a new listing, and the tenants had lived there more than 20 years. My potential customer seemed interested.

We walked up to the third floor, and it sounded like someone was working upstairs. Perfect! Even if my keys didn't work, this person could let me in. Hopefully, he or she was renovating!

I'd let the tenant know we'd be coming the day before, but I had to knock, knock and knock. No answer. The person mustn't of heard me, so I knocked again and finally let myself in. The door was chained.

A man came down and started screaming at me through the crack in the door. I had no idea what was going on. Finally, he opened it; he was wearing a white T-shirt and nothing else. Nothing. I turned to head downstairs, but as disgusting as this was, the potential tenant still asked if we could see the inside. The guy said, "Fine! You want to see the place? It's a fking shithole!"

So we whirled through the place and finally began to leave. My client said, "I like the place a lot. I'd take it, but I'm afraid of a landlord who'd rent to someone like that." I concurred, just wanting to be done. Then he said, "That was a large pile of guns."

Either I had tunnel vision or blacked out, but I completely missed a stockpile of firearms. I apologized for everything and never summoned the courage to follow up.

I let my boss know what happened, and we held off showing the place until it was vacant, but the office had a good laugh at the college kid's first showing. ×××

WIT AND WISDOM

THE FIRST TIME HE STOOD up at an open mike 20 years ago, Boston comic Louis C.K. famously bombed, having mere two minutes of material. He's since expanded his repertoire. Enough to net him a successful sitcom (Louie), an Emmy, stand-up specials, writing and directing credits, and the spotlight at the Wilbur Theatre. The American ★★★ ½ A triumph of form over content, director Anton Corbijn's curiously affecting mood piece follows George Clooney's haunted, aging assassin as he hides out in the Italian mountains of Abruzzo. Synced to a different time signature than most contemporary thrillers, The American comprises long silent spells and existential dread. Cinematographer Martin Ruhe paints a lush canvas of verdant riverbanks and dim, foreboding nighttime streets. The anxiety in the stillness gets under your skin. Clooney isn't just getting more annoyingly handsome as the years go on; the sonofabitch is also becoming a better actor—simultaneously bolder and more restrained. The American calls to mind his heartbroken astronaut in Steven Soderbergh's underrated Solaris remake. Showing no trace of his gregarious movie-star persona, Clooney is gaunt and haunted. Often banished to the far corner of the widescreen frame, he methodically scans the surroundings for threats, never at rest. Playing a man with no past and no future, he lives only in the precarious present. Corbijn's impeccably controlled filmmaking hammers home the loneliness of this condition. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Concert ★★ ½ Sad-eyed Andrei, once a revered conductor of Russia's Bolshoi Orchestra, is now a disgraced janitor. Thirty years ago he ignored Brezhnev's orders to fire his Jewish musicians, and the ensuing decades haven't been kind. Redemption lurks on the horizon, as one day, while polishing the brass in the Bolshoi director's office, Andrei intercepts an invitation from Paris' Théâtre du Châtelet. It couldn't be that difficult to impersonate an orchestra, right? Why not get the old band back together? Writer/director Radu Mihaileanu skips jauntily over this scenario's implausibilities and piles on the colorful characters and broad stereotypes. There's much discussion of "the Slavic temperament," which in this case is code for drunken boisterousness. Assisted by his bearish, ambulance-driving cellist and a hilarious former KGB stooge, Andrei enlists gypsy fiddlers to forge passports and even persuades a tone-deaf gangster to sponsor the trip. The Concert's pleasures, however minor, come from the old underdog formula, as it's tough not to hope this rag-tag band recaptures lost glory. (At West Newton.)

Dinner for Schmucks ★★ Have wacky hair and false teeth ever made a performer more amusing? Or are they just the affectations of performers trying way too hard? Paul Rudd stars as an up-and-coming financial analyst who, after impressing his haughty boss, is invited to a special dinner party with the executive class. The only catch is he's required to bring an idiot that all these rich jerks can mock during the meal. Initially repulsed, the opportunistic Rudd suddenly sees a promotion in his future after accidentally hitting Steve Carell's loudmouth grotesque with his car. Every performance is hideously overscaled in this film, and director Jay Roach's unfortunate tendency to keep the camera within six inches of their faces underlines the strain. There's a pleading quality to Dinner for Schmucks that's the antithesis of funny, as watching talented people ham it up in pore-exposing close-ups inspires more pity than giggles. Why is Roach so hell-bent on turning such talented actors into prop comics? (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Expendables ★★★ Some kind of meathead masterpiece, Sylvester Stallone's latest is cinematic junk food of the highest order. It's an old-school, men-on-a-mission movie that's so retro you'll feel like you should be watching it on a beat-up VHS tape. Both shameless and weirdly sincere in its dunderheadedness, the movie is a relic from a crasser, ruder era before irony seeped into pop entertainment and ruined everything. Sly wants to party like it's 1986, when musclemen ruled the multiplexes, women existed only to be rescued and there wasn't a problem that couldn't be solved with a machine gun. Stuff blows up real good, and all the steroids and testosterone almost stain the screen. Stallone is clearly unconcerned with the demands of his so-called story, instead smartly structuring the picture so that it boasts at least one ridiculous action sequence per reel, culminating in a balls-to-the-wall killing spree. The Expendables is defiantly anachronistic and succeeds at being exactly what it wants to be. I haven't had this much fun at the movies all summer. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Get Low ★★ Robert Duvall has made a career out of sounding the depths of that cuddly, incorrigible heart of darkness lurking just beneath the Mason-Dixon Line, and Get Low director Aaron Schneider trades on this shamelessly. The former Boo Radley stars as a Depression-era boogeyman who returns after 40 years in the woods with a

GONE FISHIN'

Hoax, happenstance and the state of modern mockumentaries

Catfish ★★
Starring Nev Schulman, Rel Schulman and Megan Faccio. Directed by Henry Joost and Ariel Schulman. At Kendall Square Cinema.

IS IT LIVE, OR IS IT MEMOREX? So asked a Don Draper–worthy ad campaign in the 1980s, one that remains stuck in the heads of people who grew up with cassette tapes and other antiquated technologies. The slogan was a play on authenticity. But alas, after the dawn of reality TV and the increasingly slippery slope of documentary filmmaking ethics, our problem in the 21st century is that we're always wondering if what we're watching is, in fact, real.

Counterfeit mockumentary tactics broke big in the horror genre back in 1999 with The Blair Witch Project. Films like Fourth Kind, Quarantine, Paranormal Activity and The Last Exorcism have been cashing in on that "found-footage" gimmick ever since. Meanwhile, so-called documentaries have been getting even phonier, adopting reality-show editing techniques and fudging facts to the point where even Michael Moore may soon call foul.

Nanette Burstein's 2008 Sundance smash (and subsequent box-office bomb) American Teen was so transparently scripted and brazenly manipulated, it made Jersey Shore look like The Sorrow and the Pity. And just recently, Joaquin Phoenix filmed himself having a hilariously fake nervous breakdown. Where's the line, anymore?

And what to make of Catfish? Yet another Sundance sensation that purports to be a stranger-than-fiction true story, the movie doesn't ever quite feel like it's playing on the level. Produced by Hollywood's most unremarkable lackey, Brett Ratner, is this all some sort of Borat-style performance piece? And if so, why isn't it more interesting?

I must tread lightly here to avoid spoilers. A deeply average and annoyingly overemotive young man named Nev Schulman works as a freelance photographer in New York City. One day he's contacted by eight-year-old Abby Pierce, an art prodigy living in Michigan who enjoys painting portraits of his photos.

Faster than you can say My Kid Could Paint That (calling to mind Amir Bar-Lev's documentary from a couple years back) Nev becomes a mentor to Abby, then finds himself smitten with her entire family via Facebook. We're supposed to buy that Nev falls head over heels for Abby's 19-year-old virgin half-sister, Megan, sight unseen. They talk all the time online, but for only brief moments on the actual telephone.

Is this some sort of Borat-style performance piece? If so, why isn't it more interesting?

He never speaks to Abby at all.

Megan claims to have written a song about her beloved Nev, but a brief jaunt around the Internet tells him this tune was already available, years ago, on the One Tree Hill soundtrack. You might wonder why he never bothers to Google Abby, the young art genius, who at eight years of age purportedly has her own gallery and a long roster of wealthy patrons. Funny how net-savvy Nev never looks into any of this stuff. And then comes the eventual twist I'm not supposed to reveal.

Most of Catfish feels fake, as if Schulman and his coconspirators stumbled into a weird story and retroactively overcompensated by shooting bogus footage to make themselves look like suckers for the first hour. It's impossible to imagine these sly 20-something guys, glued to their iPhones with digital cameras at the ready, being taken in by such a grand, easily disprovable hoax.

Of course they weren't. Nev's sexting with Megan is the most revealing cop-out I've ever seen. He can't commit to anything, knowing the deal from the start, and spends the rest of the time trying to cover his own ass in order to still seem appealing on camera.

So what are we left with? The final 30 minutes of Catfish are indeed deeply sad, and the film becomes improbably moving in spite of its smarmy protagonist. There's a devastating story to be told here, with deep reservoirs of heartbreak that remain untroubled by the central figure's jerky nonchalance.

Prankster street-artist Banksy's Exit Through the Gift Shop still ranks as the best so-called documentary I've seen in some time, and there's been way too much ink spilled trying to figure out if that movie is the real deal. But whether it's a hoax or not is immaterial, as the movie's barbed message comes through loud and clear regardless. In fact, I think the film actually works better if he faked it.

Catfish has no such subversive point of view. This isn't live; this is a cheap reproduction. ✖✖✖ giant wad of rumpled "hermit-money," determined to stage his own funeral. The only catch is that he wants to be around for the proceedings. Thank God then for Bill Murray, wryly playing a transplanted Chicago mortician with a penchant for top-coats and a tendency toward drink. The characterization in the movie is what works, with odd details that inform their backgrounds. But Schneider seems to see it otherwise, ramping up the melodrama for a shocking revelation that is neither shocking nor revelatory. Overdirecting in an amateur fashion, he hard-sells a quaint story to the point where a humble little movie feels like it's constantly puffing out its chest. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square, West Newton and in the suburbs.)

The Girl Who Played With Fire ★★ This spring's surprise art-house smash The Girl With the Dragon Tattoo didn't do much for me, but I can understand its appeal. Based on the first book of Swede Stieg Larsson's best-selling trilogy, the film spiced up hoary CBS procedural tropes with dashes of tawdry transgression and chic exoticism. It was like an episode of Cold Case, but with subtitles, facial piercings and rape. The Girl Who Played With Fire, alas, is one of those sad sequels that removes everything anyone might've enjoyed in the original. Noomi Rapace's iconic damaged hacker Lisbeth Salander is framed for murder, and only her beloved, beleaguered journalist Mikael Blomkvist believes she's innocent. Cripplingly, the film commits the Jewel of the Nile sequel sin of keeping the two characters we came to see apart for the entire running time. Meager as Dragon Tattoo's pleasures were, the two leads worked well together. This time, not a single word is exchanged between them. Occasional e-mails just don't cut it, chemistry-wise. (At West Newton and in the suburbs.)

Going the Distance ★★ ½ In the cesspool of modern romantic comedy, littered as it is with grim vehicles for the unappealing likes of Jennifer Aniston, Kate Hudson and Katherine Heigl, this flawed but ultimately adequate film feels like a masterwork. A so-called chick flick that doesn't hate women and won't make you want to gouge your eyes out? Stop the presses! Borrowing more from Judd Apatow's sentimental gross-outs than, say, 27 Dresses, Going the Distance stars an irresistible Drew Barrymore as the oldest intern in the history of newspapers. The more she cusses, drinks and stuffs her face with buffalo wings, the more appealing she becomes. Freed from the prissy confines of most rom-com leads, she's a potty-mouthed hard-partier who isn't afraid to admit that she enjoys sex. It's impossible to imagine uptight US Weekly drones like Aniston or Heigl indulging in the kind of stoned lasciviousness that Barrymore gets away with here. She carries the movie on lusty giggles and F-bombs, handling both the movie's filthiest and most formulaic material with grace. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Inception ★★★ ½ Ever since his art-house smash Memento, writer/director Christopher Nolan has been obsessed with smashing up the syntax of conventional thrillers. Inception is the kind of pet project that could only happen in the wake of The Dark Knight, as Nolan scored a couple hundred million dollars by helming one of the biggest blockbusters of all time. Inception is an expansive, expensive brain-bender rooted in genre satisfactions; half Solaris, half The Matrix. Leonardo DiCaprio stars as a sullen corporate espionage agent slinking around Kyoto stealing valuable information by infiltrating people's dreams. Cleverly layered, the movie jumbles four separate realities into continuous sequences, as action scenes happen simultaneously across different dimensions but with the same characters. It's a huge movie full of meaty ideas, even when the backbreaking ambition begins to feel like a grind. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Jack Goes Boating ★ ½ One of our finest actors and his own worst enemy, Philip Seymour Hoffman roars way beyond the boundaries of cloying schmaltz, directing and starring in this desperately cutesy adaptation of a play by Bob Glaudini. At his mouth-breathing worst, Hoffman stars as a stunted man-child who grows stupid dreadlocks and gets shoved into blind dates with Amy Ryan's cuckoo, damaged wallflower. Both are ostensibly adults who live in New York City, yet they carry themselves like idiot children at all times. The movie is fraught with condescension, as if this is how hip, downtown New Yorkers imagine the underclass. Hoffman's anti-social hyperventilator is too timid to do much besides whimper, cry and learn to swim in order to impress this woman who obviously just wants to have sex with him. Despite the frank drug usage and freewheeling infidelity by co-stars John Ortiz and Daphne Rubin-Vega, these characters all overdose on writerly quirks, never once behaving remotely like recognizable human beings. The endless monologues and cramped settings give away this tale's off-off-off Broadway origins. (At Kendall Square.)

The Kids Are All Right ★★★ ½ Simply delightful. Director/cowriter Lisa Cholodenko's family farce stars Annette Bening and Julianne Moore as lesbian helicopter moms flummoxed by their kids' latching on to their hapless, sperm donor dad. Played with no shortage of comic brilliance by Mark Ruffalo, he's a bare-chested, groovy organic farmer with a hankering for instant gratification and a penchant for phrases like, "Right on." Complications ensue. Gently ribbing certain Whole Foods lifestyle choices that'll be familiar to anybody from California or Cambridge, The Kids Are All Right has a warm, randy spirit, which embraces these characters not in spite of, but because of their imperfections. Moore, in particular, hasn't been allowed to cut loose like this in eons. She's a lost New Age girl trying to get her groove back, while Bening's tightly wound wine aficionado scores all the haymaker put-downs. Cholodenko's last film was 2002's wonderful Laurel Canyon, and Kids hits the same raunchy comedic heights. In Cholodenko's world, middle age is a funny and sexy place to be. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square, Stuart Street Playhouse and in the suburbs.)

Machete ★★ Based on a two-and-a-half minute trailer Robert Rodriguez shot for the 2007 mega-bomb Grindhouse, Machete stars B-movie icon Danny Trejo as a monosyllabic Mexican Shaft, sending up blaxploitation tropes with a Mexi-Cali accent. Like most Rodriguez movies, this one was shot on the cheap in Austin and contains enough wit and invention to entertain the audience for 15 minutes. Too bad about that last hour and a half. Robert De Niro embarrasses himself trying to send up a certain Arizona senator, but finds himself outclassed by a couple of startlingly game performances

Band Together

Boy, Oh, Boy So you secretly like the Jonas Brothers? Might we suggest BoyBand: Breakin' Through in '82 from local production company Artigo/Ajemian Films? The movie follows Brad Roberts, a football-playing senior who quits the team to pursue his musical dreams. Catch the premiere at the Regent Theatre on Sept. 30.

from Don Johnson (as a redneck militia madman) and Steven Seagal (as a crime lord wondering how he didn't get at least a cameo in The Expendables). Meanwhile, Lindsay Lohan gets naked, Jessica Alba is saddled with some ill-advised political speeches and all of Rodriguez's low-rent gore-hound fantasias never quite congeal into actual scenes. He should just make trailers. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Mesrine: Killer Instinct ★★ ½ The first half of director Jean-Francois Richet's two-part biopic (the second hits screens next month) stars great scenery-chewer Vincent Cassel as France's most notorious bank robber/kidnapper/cold-blooded killer. Based on Jacques Mesrine's autobiography, the movie has bad attitude to burn. After developing his disdain for human life while stationed in Algeria, the sneering protagonist cuts a wide swath of crime across several countries, taking on everybody from the Mafia to the Quebec prison system. Cassel's a mesmerizing firebrand, kneecapping and pistol-whipping at the drop of a hat. There's also a delicious supporting turn from Gerard Depardieu as a sinister mob boss with no illusions about where this game is headed. Unfortunately, Killer Instinct attempts to cover too much too quickly. The movie leapfrogs from one badass set-piece to another, skimming decades without enough connectivity to hold the story together. Mesrine's partner-in-crime Jeanne (Cécile de France) doesn't even arrive until halfway through the movie, so their affair remains underdeveloped. It's just a string of nifty anecdotes. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

The Other Guys ★★★ Every bit the movie Kevin Smith's Cop Out desperately wanted to be, Will Ferrell's fourth collaboration with his Anchorman director Adam McKay is another take on the oft-parodied milieu of 1980s mismatched buddy pictures. Except unlike Cop Out, this film has actual laughs. Ferrell tones it down and actually acts for a change, playing a forensic accountant stranded on desk duty. Supercops Samuel L. Jackson and Dwayne Johnson get all the glory, destroying entire city blocks chasing down pot dealers, while Ferrell and his frustrated partner, Mark Wahlberg, chase down a much more insidious band of Wall Street swindlers. Even at his most restrained, Ferrell's mugging can grow tiresome. Good thing Wahlberg plays all this nonsense totally straight. He takes the role so seriously, you'd think he was up for another Academy Award. Marky Mark huffs and puffs as if nobody told him he was in a comedy. His reaction shots are better than any of the jokes. Nobody plays exasperation better. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Piranha 3D ★★ ½ Much to the chagrin of self-described visionary James Cameron (who, coincidentally, helmed 1981's Piranha 2: The Spawning), director Alexandre Aja's craptacular opus applies all the advances of modern 3-D technology to reach the heights of schlocky, drive-in garbage. From the opening scene, in which Richard Dreyfuss reprises his iconic Jaws role and gets eaten by prehistoric fish, this is a picture that embraces its tackiness. Elisabeth Shue gamely keeps a straight face as sheriff of an Arizona resort town inundated with college students on spring break. An outbreak of homicidal aquatic creatures puts a dent in all the wet T-shirt contests, disappointing poor Jerry O'Connell, who's trying to film some Girls Gone Wild–esque videos while all the talent is getting chomped in half. It's a kick to watch dimwit frat boys and coed floozies buying it in the most graphic ways imaginable. In fact, Pirahna 3D's showstopping centerpiece ramps up the carnage to such jaw-dropping levels that it's a letdown when the movie circles back to some semblance of a story. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Salt ★★★ We've come to that point in blockbuster season when simple competence feels like something remarkable. Salt stars Angelina Jolie as a poker-faced CIA analyst outed as a Russian spy by a mouth-breathing defector. Is she or isn't she? It's a question you ponder when studying Jolie's brusque, Sphinx-like performance, as the role slyly takes advantage of her odd, non-human characteristics. What's left is a propulsive 90-minute chase sequence, executed in high style by director Phillip Noyce, There Will be Blood cinematographer Robert Elswit and veteran editor Stuart Baird. A technical marvel, Salt is the rare modern action movie that cares enough to orient the viewer during the excitement, using long Steadicam shots and savvy edits where most filmmakers employ chaotic cross-cutting. The retro charms don't just extend to Russian baddies; the whole movie feels like a relic from another age, as commitment to craft trumps CGI bombast. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Scott Pilgrim vs. the World ★ Based on the beloved comic by Bryan O'Malley, Shaun of the Dead director Edgar Wright's latest has an intriguing hook. In order to date his elusive dream girl (Mary Elizabeth Winstead), simpering Scott Pilgrim (Michael Cera, acting exactly like he always does) must first defeat her League of Evil Exes. Alas, Wright has little interest in the romantic aspects of this fertile idea. He's not really interested in anything besides pandering to his target audience with obscure pop references, protracted CGI fisticuffs and endorsing a worldview that can best be described as limited. It's like Juno for adolescent boys, at every turn reminding the teenage fans that they're smarter and better than everybody else around them. The moral of the movie is that it's OK to be an unfaithful, socially awkward, couch-surfing loser with nothing to offer. There's no coming-of-age here, just something deeply sad. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Takers ★ Making a brief pit stop in the theaters on its way to Redbox kiosks, this comically derivative cops-and-robbers tale is a vanity project for producers/stars/felons Chris Brown and Tip "T.I." Harris. The wannabe music moguls cast themselves in a blatant knockoff of Michael Mann's Heat, borrowing the sleek suits and epic shoot-outs like a couple of little boys playing dress-up. The ridiculously overqualified Idris Elba (best known as Stringer Bell from HBO's The Wire) stars as the cool, calculating leader of a heist crew angling for one last score before retirement. Matt Dillon plays a cop-on-the-edge, and perhaps the only L.A.P.D. detective allowed to walk around the office in his undershirt. T.I.'s rogue ex-con gets out of jail with a "foolproof" armored car job, and everybody strikes dramatic poses against the glossy cinematography. Lacking a single original moment, the movie regurgitates massive chunks of True Romance and Mann's oeuvre. But Takers does manage to answer one question: How can you make Hayden Christensen even more annoying? Put him in a hipster fedora. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

He Comes With Baggage

Killer Ensemble George Clooney plays a hit man, hiding out in Italy, in Anton Corbijn's moody The American.

The Tillman Story ★★★ Pat Tillman turned down a multimillion-dollar NFL contract to enlist in the army and serve his country. His sacrifice was rewarded with distortion, demagoguery and a chain of lies snaking up through the top levels of command. Killed by friendly fire in an accident the Bush administration sold as an act of valor, Tillman became an easy symbol for a government trying to foist an unpopular war on a weary public. But Tillman's loved ones wouldn't stand for that. Amir Bar-Lev's rousing, sometimes shocking documentary follows the Tillman family as they struggle through mountains of red tape and bureaucratic doublespeak to knock down the military's manufactured narratives in search of the truth. This is an angry film, but righteously so. The complex and brooding Tillman was used as a poster boy for a cause he'd lost faith in, and this documentary feels true to his restless, questioning spirit. (At Kendall Square.)

Toy Story 3 ★★★★ So this year's summer blockbuster for adults turns out to be a contemplation of mortality and obsolescence starring a bunch of animated plastic toys. You might reasonably wonder if we critics ever get bored writing love letters to Pixar, especially when it comes to a long-delayed sequel that on the surface appears to be geared toward audience familiarity and 3-D price-gouging gimmicks. Yet these sons of bitches have done it again. Tom Hanks' cowboy Woody and Tim Allen's career-redeeming Buzz

Lightyear find themselves put out to pasture once young Andy heads off to college. They're confined to a shabby daycare center that carries eerie echoes of senior-citizen homes across the land. What follows is a rousing jailbreak adventure with a tragic undertow, tackling serious questions of death and abandonment in a mature manner that would make Ingmar Bergman proud, if only he'd played with dolls. This is a treasure. (In the suburbs.)

The Twilight Saga: Eclipse ★★ Probably as good as any movie based on a Stephenie Meyer novel can be, Eclipse continues the mopey saga of sparkly vampires, shirtless werewolves and a heroine so vapid that in terms of toxic female characterizations she makes Carrie Bradshaw seem generous and self-aware. The new addition here is directorial competence, something the first two features sorely lacked. Filmmaker David Slade previously helmed the pedophile's nightmare Hard Candy and a very different vampire picture called 30 Days of Night. Also, stuff actually happens this time. There's a rascally pack of newborn vampires tearing up the Pacific Northwest, and the film picks up steam when it strays from the Hot Topic teen angst and charts an uneasy alliance between the vampires and werewolves against their common enemies. Slade's got visual chops to burn and shoots Robert Pattinson's fey dreamboat Edward and Kristen Stewart's petulant twit Bella in romanticized, wide-screen close-ups. But in the end it's still a Twilight movie, which means queasy sexual politics, rancid dialogue and terrible lead performances. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

HEART STRINGS

Multitasker Esperanza Spalding brings hope to the vitality of jazz.

WHEN YOU'RE TOUTED as one of jazz's brightest new stars, there's little time for laundry. In a recent week, Esperanza Spalding went from playing with jazz royalty in a Herbie Hancock birthday concert to dates in Japan, then a return to New York to hit the studio for Joe Lovano's next record before a late-day interview.

"It's like dancing for many choreographers," the bassist/singer says of her full plate, while folding laundry in her apartment. "But it's all related. It's all music. It's based on community and collaboration. That's the only way that it works, and the only way that it grows. When I go out and bust my booty for someone else's project, it affects my projects—and visa versa. It's better if it's all mixed up."

Spalding, 25, embraces that mix on her own CDs, as well. Her new Chamber Music Society tightens the focus with a string trio that caresses her Latin-inflected arrangements and effervescent vocal flights. "I ask the string players to improvise, not [through] soloing, but as an ensemble the way a rhythm section would comp to a singer," says Spalding, who plays Sanders Theatre on Oct. 2, with strings in addition to pianist Leo Genovese, drummer Terri Lyne Carrington, and vocalists Gretchen Parlato and Leala Cyr.

The disc proves a graceful, more sophisticated follow-up to her 2008 outing Esperanza, which blended Brazilian samba and funky fusions with Spalding's alternating vocalese and lyrics sung in English, Spanish and Portuguese. That highly accessible CD spent 70 weeks on Billboard's contemporary jazz chart, sold more than 100,000 copies, and earned such high-profile fans as Letterman, Oprah and Obama. She performed three times for the president, including at the Nobel Peace Prize ceremonies at Obama's request.

The multi-ethnic Spalding, who graduated from Berklee in three years and became one of the college's youngest-ever faculty members at age 20, acknowledges that her age, look and personality have boosted her career beyond her talents.

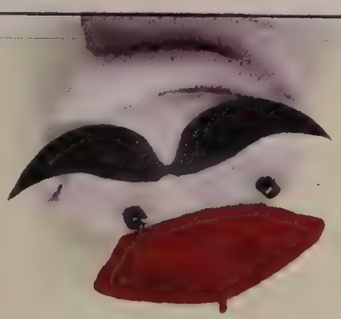
"Someone could be standing there saying the most profound shit in the world, but if they don't look right, chances are no one is going to hear what they say," she says. "Nothing I'm saying or playing is that profound, but it is good music, I'm a good musician, and it comes from my heart.... Artistically, that doesn't make you unique from everyone else out there hustling to make great music. But I have the right look, and I'm different, so people pay attention to me."

The real difference comes, Spalding says, when people listen to the album. "They hear that there's really something going on there and stay interested," she says. "Joe Lovano doesn't give a shit what I look like. He wants me to play bass because I play bass really well."



In turn, while Spalding owes much of her appeal to her airy, soaring voice, her initial musical grounding was instrumental—and largely classical. Raised in a low-income household by a single mother in Portland, Ore., Spalding was drawn to music at age 4 when she saw Yo-Yo Ma play cello on Mister Rogers' Neighborhood. Her mother enrolled her in a free community band program. No cellos were available, so she set course on violin.

In her teens, as a youth-orchestra concertmaster who was exposed to jazz at a private-arts high school, Spalding put her hands on an acoustic bass and didn't look back. "What turned me on to jazz was the bass itself, the sound," she says. "Someone explained to me the concept of the walking bass line and that all this music was just improvised within these set structures, and that's what got me."

Spalding, who also joined a Portland indie-rock band in her late teens, plans another stretch this spring. She'll follow Chamber Music Society with Radio Music Society, a CD that'll sonically come closer to pop music with horns, grooves and electric bass.

"It seems really stupid to me that [jazz] isn't on the radio," she says. "Even kindergarteners, when given the chance to get into the music in a simple way, they get it and enjoy the spontaneity."

One little girl got it, and took it from Portland to Boston to the White House. ✖✖✖

Changing Stripes

A Total Scene Stars frontman Torquil Campbell knows good chemistry when he hears it. Following the success of baroque pop sensation Broken Social Scene, Campbell spawned Stars, a sister band comprising scenesters and lots of indie euphoria. Known for their dizzying melodies and dreamy lyrics, Stars are hitting the road to promote their fourth album, In Our Bedroom After the War. Catch them on Sept. 23 at the House of Blues.

To Infinity and Beyond

Lost in Space Time travel is possible in Minor Universe 31. And people use it to get themselves into all kinds of trouble. Enter the protagonist of Charles Yu's How to Live Safely in a Science Fictional Universe. (To further play with the planes of reality, the character's name is also Charles Yu.) Joined by his operating system, he searches for his missing father while saving people from themselves—past selves, future selves and anything in-between. Find the time to see Yu at Brookline Booksmith on Sept. 28.

WHAT I DID ON MY SUMMER VACATION (PART II)

Clockwise from left: the Treasury Building in Petra; Amman; Salem making tea in Wadi Rum; typical Jordanian appetizers; an ancient shop in Petra; a camel in Wadi Rum

As a kid, I was in a school play called Appointment With Death. It was an Agatha Christie story set in Petra, which a 19th-century poet described as "a rose-red city half as old as time." I've wanted to see it ever since, and I'm pleased to report that a visit to the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan is like living an issue of National Geographic.

Amman, its capital, looks like the love child of Cairo and San Francisco—steep, densely populated hills, with the green light of a mosque on every corner. Not exactly where you'd expect to eat some of the best Asian food you've ever tasted, but the Four Seasons delivered exactly that, while shopping in the souk yielded everything from rugs to Yemeni coffee to spices like za'atar.

Wadi Rum is the desert in the south where Lawrence of Arabia fought (and the movie was filmed) in a dramatic, Mars-like landscape. Huge rock formations, seven-story sand dunes and jagged mountains are punctuated with fissures where ancient travelers carved petroglyphs, and in-between, vast stretches of wind-swept emptiness.

Our guides were Rakkan (the owner of Terhaal Adventures) and his Bedouin friend, Salem, who had two modes: singing and sarcastic. I can't overstate how nice it was to be around someone who wouldn't know a Kardashian from a pistachio nut. His camp was a barracks-like setup of goat-hair tents, with a communal area of cushions.

Because the desert gives the hinges of hell a run for its money, the Bedouins sit in the shade and drink coffee or tea during the heat of the day. Even when we climbed a mountain, Salem stopped near the top to gather wood and pick a clump of something green. In the shade of a rock, with a view that would've staggered Ansel Adams, Salem boiled tea with wild thyme. For coffee, he roasted green coffee beans on an open fire and then mixed them with cardamom.

For such a caffeinated society, it's amazing the Bedouins aren't bouncing off the canyon walls but are extremely laid-back. They eat, sleep and breathe camels—which are their favorite topic of conversation. There's even a joke: When dinner is served, men go first, camels second and women third. Lest that sound sexist, female camels are valued more highly than males, and for three days we tried to help Salem find one of his herd with her baby. We spent an afternoon helping to fill the water troughs tucked into cracks in the sandstone, but despite seeing a camel's ugly mug every time we turned around, there was no sign of her until we were leaving Wadi Rum. He called to her from half a mile away, and she came trotting.

But still, we hadn't seen Petra. Until a few decades ago, Bedouins lived in the ancient city, which was settled more than 3,000 years ago. They now live in a nearby hill town, which boasts several excellent restaurants, among them Petra Kitchen. Patrons there help prepare traditional Arab foods, and I now make a mean baba ganoush and a fatoosh salad to plotz over. Afterward, some lemon-mint tobacco in a water pipe, aka "hubbly bubbly," was just the thing to aid digestion.

You can't describe the scale or magnificence of Petra, the capital of the Nabataeans (look 'em up in the Old Testament). Visitors enter through a mile-long chasm made famous by an Indiana Jones film that launched a thousand souvenir shops. Sheer stone walls, 300 feet high, enclose you, and just as the claustrophobia begins to seep in, you turn a corner and glimpse a sliver of the gigantic, ornately carved façade of the so-called Treasury Building (which was actually a temple). It's jaw-dropping, and just the beginning of a naturally fortified city that includes houses and shops carved into the multicolored sandstone, royal tombs to rival any pharaoh's, a "monastery" high atop a mountain and an amphitheater dating from the Roman era. The only thing more mind-boggling than Petra itself is the fact that only a third of it's uncovered. The rest is still buried under eight meters of sand.

On our way out of the country, we got a glimpse of two royal nature preserves—Dana and Wadi Mujib, which boast stunning vistas and amazing biodiversity, plunging from alpine heights to hundreds of feet below sea level. Leaving Jordan was like waking up from a dream out of 1,001 Nights, and by all appearances, King Abdullah II and Queen Rania deserve all the adoration they enjoy. I just hope that when I go back, and I certainly intend to, the Bedouins still don't know what a Starbucks is. ✖✖✖

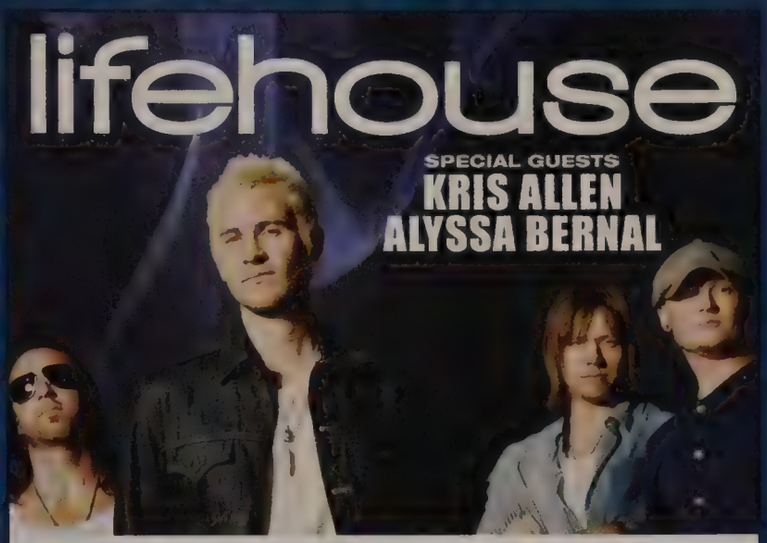
THIS IS AN AD FOR A BURRITO.

A typical fast food ad would show some sexy food porn, but we prefer not to play by the rules of fast food advertising (or fast food).



We believe food can be delicious, healthful, raised sustainably and served fast, all at a reasonable price. It's why we work with family farmers and ranchers who practice sustainable farming methods. And it's why we go out of our way to buy as much naturally raised meat, organic beans and local produce as we can, even if it costs us more. You see, we're on a never-ending quest to change the way people think about and eat fast food. So, when all that's left of your burrito is the foil, we know it's working.

We'll Always Have Boston

As a French major in college, I fantasized about working as a Paris correspondent. Just the title seemed glamorous to the 21-year-old me, a glass of Champagne to my usual $2 pitcher of beer. A pretentious devotee of Jean-Luc Godard and Marguerite Duras, I arrived at Columbia's J-school convinced of my destiny, earnestly enrolling in "International Reporting" with a former bureau chief. To my surprise, the professor didn't discuss such positions—too rare—and focused entirely on covering wars. In a very French turn of events, I had une petite crise d'identité.

As happens, I found a (slightly) more practical professional path, contributing to city magazines in this country, which still suited my preference for wearing striped Ts. The past four years at The Improper Bostonian represent the high point in this career and leaving next month for France feels bittersweet. No, French Vogue didn't call; my charming husband landed a job overseas. In a roundabout way, I see my youthful dream being fulfilled. Who knew finance was a better route to Paris than writing about food and wine?

Given my love for Boston and this publication, the move isn't made without hesitation. Watching my son on the playground last week, I started to worry. He was born here! We know all the neighborhood kids! They speak English! In the midst of this panic, he shoved his girlfriend (an older lady by a week) and then kissed her. Exactly, I thought. "Bye, bye" he likes to tell her, followed quickly by "back!" Paris may have eluded me for a decade, but its pull remains irresistible. So I go, toddler in tow, book project in mind, the fantasy grown up.

WEALTHY APPETITE

FEW CHEFS live like kings, but a lucky few cook for them. "I'm an artist with a benefactor," says Neal Salisbury, 42. "I've cooked for more billionaires than any other chef in the world." Until recently, the Boston native manned the kitchen on John Henry's superyacht; now he freelances for the rich and royal. "They're floating cities," says Salisbury, whose maritime clients have included Martha Stewart and Diddy. "The challenge is to keep the owner's standards of cuisine anywhere in the world."

Soak It Up

$120 at Skoah, 641A Tremont St., Boston (857-350-4930) skoahboston.com

With the humidity waning and the breakout months upon us, the new skincare retreat Skoah arrived just in time. The South End spot opened its doors last month, selling and using the Canadian line owner Peter Dziedzic discovered on a recent trip to Vancouver. I opted for their signature "facialiscious," a 90-minute facial, complete with a consultation and massage. In the first 10 minutes, we discussed my skin and analyzed my daily routine, like a personal-training session. Then my technician applied the products in a series of three masks, while I soaked in the benefits. As someone who desperately wants to break her expensive face-cream habit, I left with a handful of recommended items (around $25 each) and an easy-to-follow "Skin Skedule." I was shocked to see my dry patches disappear and my complexion even out with each wash. I'm a convert. Bring on the cold front.

I'd heard plenty about chef Tiffani Faison's impressive command of modern Italian cuisine, making the house-made pasta my first order of business at Rocca. The raved-about taleggio envelopes don't appear on the Sunday night menu, so I picked the bucatini. It was no slouch. Thin noodles came dressed in a decadent, bright brown butter and Meyer-lemon tomato sauce with crispy, garlicky breadcrumbs and a mound of shucked lobster.

Going Out

Doubling Down

Deuxave sits at the intersection of Mass. and Comm. avenues: Deux-Ave, get it? Owners Brian Piccini and Christopher Coombs have been working on the space for two years. A chic design proves they're prepared for the Back Bay scene. After years of running Dbar in Dorchester, the more congested parking situation is another story.

"Brian, I think you're getting a ticket," one hustling waiter warns.

Seems an officer has a problem with Piccini's car being stationed in the valet spot. "I know. It's my restaurant," he retorts. Must feel pretty good.

The busy street scene is a selling point. Piccini explains, "We have customers saying, 'It feels very New York, with the cabs flying by, and the people and the traffic. Don't ever close your blinds.'"

In contrast to the views and the interior's restrained elegance, chef Combs' food feels indulgent, both in flavor and description. A listing for Persian-spiced Long Island duck breast ($28) begins with "cast-iron roasted" and ends 19 words later with "sherry-Pommery mustard sauce and natural jus." ("He'd write a book if he could," Piccini says.) Throughout the menu, local ingredients are prepared with his French techniques. The ticker-tape reports of duck confit ($14) and seared diver scallops ($28) are dotted with terms like "aigre-doux," "crépenette" and "en cocotte."

"Going to Dorchester formed who I am as a chef, to take high-end cuisine and make it affordable," Coombs says. "This is a tremendous middle ground." NICK ALTSCHULLER

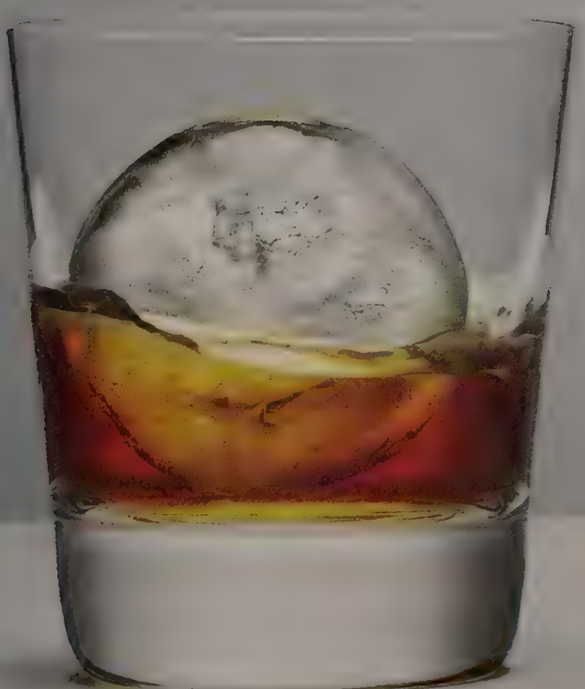
STREGA STRIKES AGAIN

A grand arrival at Fan Pier

BY THE NUMBERS, IT'S impressive: nearly 6,000 square feet of space, three private dining rooms, two fireplaces, 20 flat-screen TVs. But Strega Waterfront is about more than size. It's about bringing "transatlantic cruise-ship" glamour to Fan Pier, complete with chandeliers, terrazzo flooring imported from Italy, and walls paneled in oak and marble. Besides a roster of house-made pastas and risottos, the menu includes indulgent dishes like grilled veal porterhouse with truffle sauce. Not feeling fancy? Try paninis and crêpes at the casual Caffe di Marina, opening next year.

CHEF BRIAN POE, of Poe's Kitchen at the Rattlesnake, is looking forward to "another fun adventure" as he prepares to open a new eatery with Rattlesnake owner Gordon Wilcox. Poe's Chester Square Pub will feature "a world approach" to food and debut in the South End early next year.

A CAMBRIDGE BRANCH of Lowell's Life Alive is slated to open around Oct. 7 at 765 Mass. Ave. in Central Square. The website promises "delicious, organic and therapeutic food" in the form of rice bowls, wraps, salads and smoothies.



IS IT A BAKERY with a full-service restaurant in front or a restaurant with a bakery in back? Sugar Baking Company and Restaurant is set to open in late October in Roslindale Square. Co-owner Johnny Fortin, who also owns the Rox Diner in West Roxbury, says the combination means that baked goods "can literally go from ovens to plates in less than an hour." And "while you're eating, you can watch what's happening in the bakery." Sugar will serve breakfast, lunch and dinner.

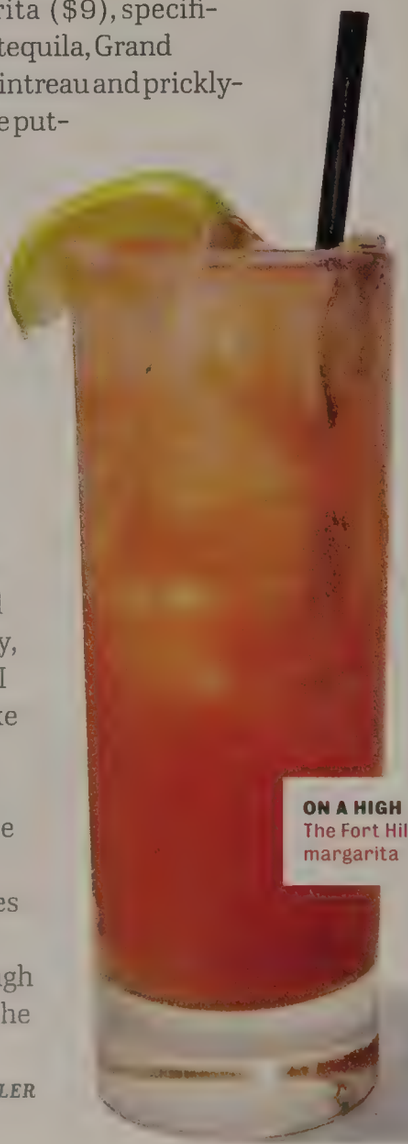
Drink of the Moment

NEIGHBORHOOD STRONGHOLD

The corner of Northampton Street and Columbus Avenue was home to Bob's Southern Bistro for 18 years. After owner Darryl Settles sold the spot in 2007, two restaurants came and went with such velocity that some have now deemed the location cursed. "People keep saying that," Settles says. "They just had concepts that didn't work."



Darryl's Corner Bar & Kitchen
604 Columbus Ave., Boston
(617-536-1100)
darrylscornerbarboston.com

Settles has returned with Darryl's Corner Bar & Kitchen, with a concept he simply calls "a neighborhood place." He's bringing back the catfish strips, the crab cakes—"'cause everyone keeps asking about them"—and cocktails like the CHICKEN MARTINI ($10), a slightly fruity, Hennessey-inflected drink Settles created as a tougher version of his usual apple martini.

Then there's the margarita ($9), specifically a Cadillac margarita (tequila, Grand Marnier and sour) with Cointreau and prickly-pear syrup. "When we were putting the list together, we asked Darryl, 'Are there any names you want to incorporate? Something special?'" bartender Chris Whitney recalls. "He chimed in, and it was deemed the FORT HILL."

"People feel like this area has been taken from them," says Settles, who once lived in the Fort Hill neighborhood of Roxbury, just a few blocks south. "I put the name on it to make them feel comfortable. I want to make sure that everyone knows everyone is welcome here."

As service begins, Settles greets the day's first customers as they walk through the door. "Hi, I'm Darryl," he says, and shows them to their table. NICK ALTSCHULLER

INSPECTOR GADGET

Technophobia? There's an app for that.

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

I WAS AT THE GDGT TECH EXPO and feeling out of touch. Powerline network kits? Dual USB GPS car chargers? These aren't the gadgets of my youth. I worked at a Brookstone. A waffle iron/alarm clock that plays humpback mating calls, that's a gadget. A FreeAgent GoFlex TV? That's just a… well, it sort of, um… OK, I really have no idea.

The very first booth I visited hammered home my Luddite status. "So, what do you guys do?" I asked a representative from Springpad.

"I'll show you. Do you have an iPhone or a Droid?"

"I have none of those things."

And then we shared an awkward silence.

There was only one person in attendance who appeared to understand my unease. A man with no companion, looking a bit lost, and a bit ridiculous in a white, skintight, electroluminescent costume.

Don't blame me. I just work here.

"Hey, Tron Guy. What are you doing here?"

"I'm just here for Lenovo."

"What do they have you doing?"

"Just standing around, bein' Tron Guy."

Not on my watch, friend. Averting my eyes from his unfortunate spandex bulge, I put Tron Guy to work explaining one of the featured products. Seems Lenovo developed a kind of one-handed keyboard remote to make surfing the Web on your TV easier. Sadly, I don't have the Web on my TV. In fact, I realized, I've never actually seen one of Tron Guy's YouTube videos. I've never even seen Tron. That's when my shame spiral really started to spin.

I don't have the Internet on my phone. I don't even have wireless! I have no DVR. My non-HD TV is longer than it is wide and weighs more than my oven. What can I do? Teach me, Tron Guy! "What's the name of this device?"

"I don't know."

Well, if a man dressed as a computer program can't be relied on for technological expertise, that certainly levels the playing field. With renewed confidence, I wandered over to the Kodak booth to speak with a nervous young man about the PlaySport video camera he had submerged in a fishbowl. I guess being waterproof at 10 feet is impressive, but why would I choose the PlaySport over the PlayTouch, with its on-screen editing and better Web connectivity? "If you go scuba diving—well, shallow scuba diving," he replied.

Shockingly, it appeared I was the most tech-savvy person in attendance. So, as a man who still listens to cassette tapes, I present the gdgt Best in Show.

3. Scvngr, based in Cambridge, is a free, location-based app like Foursquare and Gowalla. The difference? Rather than simply "checking in" at a participating location, Scvngr presents you with challenges. Board the Fung Wah Bus, snap a picture of yourself making it to New York without catching on fire, earn a discount on your next trip. I have my suspicions about these apps, as my friends who use them don't seem to derive any real enjoyment, but Scvngr has two things in its favor. One, it just received $4 million from Google Ventures, so you might as well get used to seeing it. And two, its 21-year-old CEO dropped out of Princeton and, according to The New York Times, now works 96 hours a week. Here's a kid who's torching his youth to help others have fun. I hope the inevitable truckload of cash offers some comfort.

2. "They come from the planet blõõh located in the galaxy 4210," said the guy from Mimobot. Finally! Something I can understand. Based in Allston, Mimobot makes flash drives designed to look like characters from Hello Kitty, Star Wars and more. The flash drives come with an amusing backstory, but they don't really do anything besides store data. Is it silly? Yes. Do I want a $40 C-3PO? Yup.

1. Another free app, the Woburn-based HeyWire allows you to text or chat with anyone around the world at no cost. With streamlined connectivity, you can be reached simultaneously by phone, Facebook, IM, smoke signal, whatever. "So I can never hide?" I asked the rep. "You're not the first person to say that," he confessed.

At what price, privacy? About $120 sounds right, which is what my abacus tells me I'd save if I cut texting from my phone plan. With an extra $120, maybe I could upgrade to a smartphone and actually use these programs. Or I could go to Brookstone and buy three RC helicopters and an electronic bottle opener. When it comes to gadgets, I'm a purist. ✖✖✖

BAD LIEUT.

TO THE DRUNK OFF-DUTY COP AT FENWAY PARK:
I've been in law enforcement for 15 years, and I was sitting one row away when you embarrassed our profession. You were drunk, loud and obnoxious all game long. Then the 130-pound security guard came to kick you out. You pulled out your badge and told him you would "bash his head in." [Next] the BPD came, and you decided it was time to leave. They should've arrested you instead of kicking you out! I can only hope the chief of your police department sees this and realizes what he has on his hands!

To the woman looking for a gentleman:
Yes, it's difficult to find a gentleman today. A culture of men and women who have no self-respect has all but destroyed chivalry. You have a music culture that calls women "bitches" and "whores." [But] I can assure you there are still some gentlemen out there. I continue to be one, although it's not appreciated. Real men open doors for women and still pay for the date.

A gentleman

To the rude lady on the stress-free cruise:
Thanks for making my stress-free cruise stressful. No, I didn't take your towel. I didn't appreciate your rude behavior and only gave you my towel to try to get you away from me. Try a few less mimosas and a lot more class. Next time you want to relax, do everyone a favor and stay home.

LITTLE WOMAN, WRIT LARGE

The impressive Louisa May Alcott

WITH MUCH OF THE SAME vivacious energy that Louisa May Alcott possessed, her biographer Harriet Reisen follows the life of the iconic writer who began scroungingly poor in Concord, but gained wealth and literary fame. Little Women, Little Men, Jo's Boys and the rest were based on Alcott family members, but Louisa ventured beyond her circle in her plays, articles and fiction. Bronson, her father, floated in the airy climes of Transcendentalism alongside Thoreau and Emerson. He was narcissistically detached, alternately a shamed failure and a successful speaker.

The family—they moved 30 times in 20-plus years—truly scrambled, with Louisa starting small schools, governessing, bravely nursing soldiers in the Civil War, while her passionate literary voice developed. Her mother, Abby, another expressive writer (literary apple falling not far from the tree), worked many jobs. Louisa referred to her own intense work as "falling into a vortex," and her voice in letters and diaries is indeed wonderful—inquiring, wry, colorful, heart-rich and critical. Her rambunctious ambition contained anger, and possibly some bipolar notes, too. Reisen makes the famous 19th-century characters, and their stories, gallop along excitingly. ×××

FROM PAGE 124: "Louisa made Abby a gift of the first copy, with a note that mixed pride and gratitude. 'Whatever beauty is to be found in my little book is owing to your interest in and encouragement of my efforts from the first to last,' she wrote. 'I hope to pass in time from fairies and fables to men and realities.'"

Dining { ERIN BYERS MURRAY AND FRANK MCCLELLAND }

IN FULL SWING

The Gallows covers familiar ground in a craveable new way.

"I FEEL LIKE I HAVE THE POWER seat here," announced Frank McClelland, peering down the lacquered wooden bar at the South End's newest darling. "It's like eating in an upscale barn."

A figurehead on Boston's culinary scene, McClelland is the chef/owner of L'Espalier and the three locations of the Provençal hit, Sel de la Terre. And though he's mentored dozens of successful protégés (Barry Maiden and Jeremy Sewall among them), McClelland isn't interested in a power position these days. Instead, he's into carrots. At Apple Street Farm, the 14-acre organic property in Essex where he lives, McClelland harvests enough greens, veggies and hens for his restaurants, a 30-member CSA and a handful of accounts on the North Shore.

"My big thing this year is being close to the product: putting the seed in, weeding, harvesting, bringing it to the restaurant, cooking and serving," he enthused before sniffing a glass of Fontezzopa verdicchio ($8).

The Gallows, it turned out, was just the thing for someone who'd been tilling the fields since dawn. Its slatted ceilings and walls had a rustic charm while a relaxing hum of trance-y reggae played overhead. The menu mixed the familiar and the indulgent, or as co-owner Rebecca Roth put it, "crazy-good stoner food."

To appease our munchies, we started with a platter of fried hors d'oeuvres: Scotch eggs ($6), corn dogs ($5) and Buffalo-chicken livers ($5). Each salty-fat-rich-fried combination was better than the one before. Neither of us could remember our last corn dog, nor one with such an ethereally light batter. The livers were bite-sized and earthy, with a lip-tingling heat that went well with a cold beer.

We asked our bartender to put us in the cooks' hands. Any parameters, she wondered? "I'm an animal; I'll eat everything," McClelland declared.

Roth's partner, chef Seth Morrison (the two met while working at the now-closed Perdix), moved past the fryer for our next dish, a plate of creamy bluefish pâté ($7) delicately laced with dill and smeared over crostini, heirloom tomatoes and caponata. "I'm really into salad heads right now," McClelland explained, inhaling the accompanying crucifer greens.

I wondered what his restaurant staff, comprising almost 400 employees, thought about the chef being out on the farm instead of in the kitchen every day. "The guys and gals love it," he said with a laugh. "I bring in 60 or 70 salad heads or whatever else comes up and say, 'Here, make a menu.' It's the ultimate mystery basket."

At that point, Roth brought over the restaurant's signature: poutine ($10). We sopped up every last bit of the golden, hand-cut fries with Morrison's velvety brown gravy and house-made cheese curds. A glass of Carignanissime de Centeilles ($8) provided the ideal pairing.

Next, we enjoyed the "Boston red fish" ($24), which arrived cornmeal-crusted, giving us a light and summery prelude to the main event. Roth delivered two flat-patty burgers topped with white American—"It's the best cheese to put on a burger, hands-down," she said—iceberg lettuce, griddled onions and a couple of pickles ($9). I dunked a fry into the house-made ketchup and sipped my "puppy" glass of Dale's Pale Ale ($3.50) while McClelland two-fisted the burger. Mouth full, eyes rolling toward the ceiling, he sighed. "Oh yeah," was all he could muster.

We awoke from our beef-induced daze with the arrival of our finale: layers of rum-soaked bananas, peanut-butter mousse, chocolate ganache and toasted Fluff—also known as Fluffernutter Fosters brûlée ($6).

After a few gooey bites, the farming chef's thoughts turned to his morning chores, and we had to leave the delightful dessert behind. "This place does great any-day food," he said before leaving. "And it was just what I wanted." ×××

JUST FACE IT

The trouble with prosopagnosia

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

I'VE ALWAYS THOUGHT I WAS bad with names. When people approach me at parties and begin chatting in a familiar fashion, I'm often gripped by cold dread—I should know who this person is, but I don't. I presumed that this character flaw stemmed from intellectual laziness on my part, but now I'm not so sure. The New Yorker recently ran a story about a disorder called prosopagnosia, and by the time I finished reading it, I was certain that I'd found a clinical rationale for my social awkwardness. You see, I'm not bad with names. I'm bad with faces.

Prosopagnosics suffer a mental short-circuit that prevents them from recognizing faces. The worst of them can't recognize themselves in a mirror, but there are varying degrees of the affliction. I belong to the ranks of the moderately face-blind, and there's no shortage of evidence to support my self-diagnosis.

For example, Heather has two friends named Lauren and Katie. At one point, after I'd known both of them for a couple years, Lauren stopped by our apartment. Now, Lauren and Katie look superficially similar—blonde hair, about the same height. On this day Heather wasn't home, and without her cues, I couldn't figure out who I was talking to. So I took a guess, committing the conversation to a Katie-centric direction. The blonde girl looked increasingly perplexed, and then abruptly asked, "Do you think I'm Katie?" Well, I had a 50-50 shot. If I'd known then what I know now, I could've said, "Oh, sorry, I suffer from prosopagnosia. You should feel bad for me, instead of just thinking I'm a weirdo."

Another time, I was walking down Newbury Street and encountered an old editor of mine. I greeted him by name and asked how he was doing. Except, this was just some stranger who might've looked vaguely like the guy I thought he was—and who apparently had the same name, which kept him engaged long enough to completely confuse both of us. By the time we parted I'd figured out that I'd accosted a random pedestrian, but I never admitted it, and he surely went on his way wondering what the hell had just happened. Experiences like this have taught me never to trust my brain when it says I recognize someone out of context. The Black Eyed Peas could walk past, and I wouldn't look twice.

That's not an abstract example either. A few years back, Heather and I were walking through the Frankfurt airport when the Black Eyed Peas strolled by in the other direction. Now, this was before the Black Eyed Peas were quite as ubiquitous (and Fergilicious) as they are now, but come on. Is there any more recognizable collection of individuals than the Black Eyed Peas? I walked right past them. Heather, incredulous, said, "Did you not just notice the Black Eyed Peas?" I turned around in time to catch Fergie's lovely lady hump on the retreat. Thanks to my prosopagnosia, I was two-thousand-and-late.

A lot of face-blindness research is coming out of Harvard, so I decided to take one of the tests to assess the extent of my disorder—or whether I really just suffer from acute obliviousness. I went to the website Faceblind.org and fired up the Cambridge Face Memory Test.

The test presents you with a series of faces, in black and white, with no hair. They apparently want to minimize the chance that you'll cue on some obvious external signifier. As in, "OK, I see a meat suit, that must be Lady Gaga."

You have to study the faces and then pick them out of a lineup. When I began the test, I laughed at the impossibility of the challenge—everyone looked like Sinead O'Connor. But when I completed the test, I was surprised to find that I scored 75 percent correct, about 10 percent above the threshold for face-blindness.

My method, apparently successful, was to memorize individual features that corresponded to particular faces—a nose here, a jaw there. Basically, I just looked for the facial-structure equivalents of a peg-leg or a meat suit. That gave me a fine test result, but I still have a hard time believing that my face-recognition skills are on the right side of normal.

There are constant reminders of the fact that I'm not, in fact, on par with the general populace in this area. I've watched Good Will Hunting, The Informant! and all three Jason Bourne movies. One recent night, halfway through 30 Rock, it dawned on me that Liz Lemon's boyfriend looked familiar. "Is that Matt Damon?" I asked. Heather replied that it was. She didn't even sound surprised. ✖✖✖

BLATHERS MOSS

The loudmouth is the Pats' key to success.

GIVEN FOOTBALL'S NATURE, a schedule that features just 16 games is very meaningful. It goes by fast, and if your team slips, two or three weeks can be fatal. That said, New Englanders couldn't wait to finally get through the preseason and to the real deal.

This season is even more important than usual because the Red Sox were a mess almost from day one. Injuries, pitching and more injuries killed them—and our usual passion. We needed the Patriots badly. So while watching the opener, I couldn't help but think: Maybe these Patriots are great after all.

Maybe 2007 wasn't an anomaly. Maybe the Greatest Show on Turf is back. Maybe the defense is better than we thought. And maybe those defensive backs are future stars.

Then, about 30 minutes after the game, the bomb dropped. Randy Gene Moss placed it squarely down on the media. The NFL wide receiver simply couldn't help himself. He's the most selfish and self-centered individual in the whole of professional sports. It's usually about him first and second, and perhaps the team third.

In this way, Moss epitomizes the position. He's talented, arrogant and rich. If there were a picture in the dictionary of "NFL wide receiver," his mug would be there.

He barely talks these days. He keeps to himself and leaves reporters alone. His lack of openness makes it easy for others to get "his" story, or at least the one he'd like to circulate, wrong. Moss says he does so because he doesn't care what the media, or anyone else, think.

Now, after his painful, 16-minute press conference, we know otherwise. Moss reads. Moss is sensitive to what people say and think. And he decided that this was the moment to set the record straight.

Moss wanted what he thought was his right: a new contract. He looked around the locker room and saw two guys—Tom Brady and Stephen Gostkowski—who were among the top-earners at their positions this past off-season. So Moss walked into the conference room and took center stage.

"Before I get to questions, I'd like to say something. I've been here for three years. This is my fourth season. I understand the business and the nature, and I understand I've said you all have a job to do. So when it comes to football, I take my job seriously, I say [that] time and time again. But I think there is—I don't really want to say here in the organization—but I think around here in the New England area, a lot of people who don't want to see me do good. And the reason why, I don't know. I really don't care. But I just want to let you all know, you all [are] the ones that are doing all the writing, all the pen, the pad and ink. I don't have any. So, anything that I may say will get blown out of proportion."

Moss epitomizes the position. He's talented, arrogant and rich.

What precipitated this "outburst" were comments he made to CBSsports.com a few days earlier saying he was unhappy about his contract situation and didn't feel wanted. Of course, Moss didn't give a single interview this summer to a local reporter. Instead, we had to read this stuff on a national website.

Moss would go out of his way to tell us how he didn't care what others thought. But that was exactly the reason he was holding court, and doing so on live TV and radio after an important victory. It was Randy being Randy. But he's also the real deal on the field. And while we may not appreciate his occasional lack of hustle, or his penchant to sulk, he changes the way teams approach the Patriots. A big reason Wes Welker catches 100-plus passes each year is because No. 81 draws two defenders almost every play.

The Patriots also have two new rookie tight ends who are starting their careers, each looking like the anti–Ben Watson. They can catch the ball. Aaron Hernandez and Rob Gronkowski both appear to be very good. This could change things a great deal on offense, but the straw that stirs the drink is the insufferable Randy Moss. The man can still run and catch, when he wants.

And as long as the Patriots don't have a better alternative, we have to suck it up and watch—and sometimes listen. If you ask me, it's a small price to pay for success. ✖✖✖

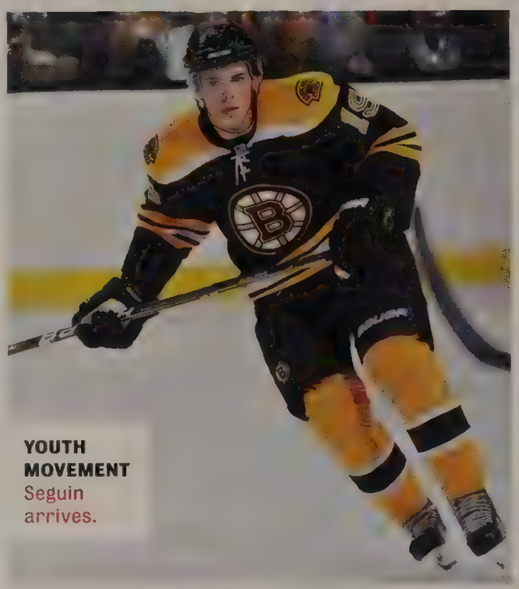
ON MAYO, J.O., SHAQ AND TEK



THE BEST 5 UNDER 25

Baby Bruin Maybe I'm jumping the gun by putting 18-year-old Tyler Seguin on this list, but whatever, the kid better get used to the pressure. Expectations won't be unrealistic for his rookie season, but they'll be significant, and if Seguin looks anything less than promising, it's going to be depressing. Almost as depressing as the fact that I now feel comfortable referring to pro athletes as "kids."

Maturation Process I was an idiot when I was 24, and that's something I keep in mind when discussing Rajon Rondo. It's a reminder that while Rondo may be entering the prime of his career, he still has a ways to grow off the court. Understandable, considering he was only six years old when Shaq made his NBA debut.

Third Time's a Charm Jerod Mayo's a day younger than Rondo, and by this point, I'd hoped he'd be almost as successful. It's not that Mayo isn't a quality linebacker; not even Tom Jackson's stupid enough to say that. But it's year three—time to make the leap from good to great. That's easy for me to say (sitting on my recliner in sweatpants), but I'm doing it anyway. (Just don't tell Jerod who you heard it from. Or, tell him it was Nick Altschuller.)

YOUTH MOVEMENT Seguin arrives.

The Year of Milan It feels like Milan Lucic has been here longer than three years, which is why it's sometimes easy to forget that he's only 22. Or maybe I'm the only one who does that. Either way, like Mayo, Lucic didn't break out as expected last season, but also like with Mayo, we're no less optimistic. And by we, I mean me. I'll never speak for you again.

Twin TEs I can't put one guy on here without mentioning the other, so Rob Gronkowski (21) and Aaron Hernandez (20) share the final spot. If you could ever combine their skills, I'm pretty sure you'd have the greatest tight end of all time. (Am I getting a little carried away?) For now, we'll have to settle for two insanely promising rookies and one happier Tom Brady.

ONE TIMES 18

Five years from now, the NFL's 18-GAME SCHEDULE won't be a big deal. By then, we'll have moved on, adjusted, we'll probably say things like, "Man, how weird is it that they used to play only 16 games?" I know that's coming, but for now I hate the idea more than I hate Bill Polian.

2 CAREERS COME TO A CLOSE

The Defining Image of Jason Varitek's Career The shot of him smacking A-Rod square in the purple mouth? That's a good one, but when I think of Tek, the first thing I see is that diving catch in 2001 that broke his elbow and cost him the season. It's a downer, but there's no better example of who Tek is as a player: tough, fearless, selfless, willing to sacrifice his body for a single out.

Enough's Enough Mike Lowell doesn't get nearly enough credit for all the crap he's put up with these final few years. Can you imagine going into work each day knowing that your boss is doing everything in his power to get rid of you? Oh, and once you get in, a bunch of random guys with recorders are there to force you to talk about it? I think 95 percent of people put in that position would've snapped.

3 Questions for Three Big Men

Is J.O. for Real? Speak to Jermaine O'Neal for five minutes, and you'll swear he's headed for 15 and 10 this season. And not because he's bragging; it's just that O'Neal has this way about him—he's engaging, focused, motivated—that makes you believe he can succeed. In a related story: O'Neal has made more than $150 million over his NBA career.

Can Baby Hold It Together? Speaking of paydays, Glen Davis is looking for one. First, Davis has to prove he can still score like he did down the stretch in 2009. Thing is, that's not what the C's want. They need an energetic forward who defends, takes charges, dives for loose balls and crashes the boards. This could get interesting.

Come On, 25 Minutes? According to Shaq, that's how many minutes a game he's expecting this season, but according to me, no way. First of all, he's not starting. Second, he won't play in crunch time because of his poor free-throw shooting. Third, he can't play for long stretches anymore. Rasheed averaged 22 last year; that's perfect.

4 DATES TO WATCH

10/6: The Celtics open the preseason against the 76ers in... drumroll, please... New Hampshire! What? You expecting Prague?

10/9: The Bruins drop the puck in Prague with the Coyotes. And just because I'm still feeling crappy about this: Do you realize that Tyler Seguin was born in 1992?! That's the same year Wayne's World came out.

10/13: Happy birthday to Paul Pierce (33) and Doc Rivers (49). The two are 16 years apart. For what it's worth (hint: nothing), Shaq and rookie Avery Bradley are 18 years apart.

10/17: The Pats host the Ravens in a rematch of last year's playoff disaster. The over/under on how many times Jim Nantz references that game during the broadcast? 147.5.

Soroff On BOBBY FLAY

The Food Network star dishes on racehorses, hot spice and cooking a whole fish.

CELEBRITY CHEF BOBBY FLAY, 45, BEGAN HIS CAREER at the age of 17, working at the legendary Joe Allen's, where his father was a partner. Impressed with Flay's talent, Allen paid his tuition to the French Culinary Institute. After working at several restaurants and developing his flair for Southwestern flavors, Flay opened Mesa Grill in 1991. Since then, his dining empire has expanded to include outposts in the Bahamas, Connecticut, Las Vegas, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. A star on the Food Network, his first show, Grillin' & Chillin', premiered in 1996, followed by Hot Off the Grill and Boy Meets Grill. He currently appears on Iron Chef America, Throwdown! With Bobby Flay, The Next Food Network Star and Grill It! With Bobby Flay. His 10th cookbook, Throwdown! More than 100 Recipes From Food Network's Ultimate Cooking Challenge, releases this month. Flay lives in New York with his wife, Stephanie March.

Jonathan Soroff: Why aren't you fat?
Bobby Flay: Because I run about five miles every day. I'm training for a marathon.

Best perk of being a celebrity chef?
Being able to get into any restaurant you want.

What's your silver bullet in the kitchen?
Chipotle peppers, of course.

Favorite spice?
Black pepper. Can't do without it.

Thing most home cooks do wrong?
I think people feel that if they're standing at the stove or the grill, they have to keep flipping things all the time, and that's really the worst thing you can do.

Fakest thing about cooking on TV?
Swap-outs. When you switch an already made dish for the one you're preparing. I don't do that, unless it's something that has to cook for like three hours. Otherwise, I cook in real time.

Favorite condiment?
Probably mustard. Dijon. I use honey and mustard as much as anything else.

Most exotic thing you ever ate?
Fugu, the Japanese blowfish that can kill you if it's not prepared properly. I thought there was more hype to it than flavor.

Grossest thing you ever consumed?
Monkfish sperm.

Anything you'd never try?
Monkey brains, but nobody's offered that to me yet. But I'll eat pretty much anything. I'm not into eating bugs and stuff like that. Anything short of an endangered species.

Sweet or savory?
Savory.

Why do you prefer to buy female racehorses?
Whoa! Where'd you get that question?

Can't reveal my sources.
Well, it's a long-winded answer, but I buy fillies because I want to keep them after their racing career, so they can have another career breeding.

How do you take your coffee?
I don't drink coffee anymore. I went to Vietnam last year with my wife, and although Vietnam is a gigantic exporter of coffee, I couldn't find good coffee there, so I started drinking tea, and I never stopped.

Spiciest thing you ever ate?
This red-hot chicken in Nashville. It was covered in cayenne.

Favorite holiday to cook for?
Thanksgiving. It's the biggest food holiday.

Celebrity you'd most like to cook for?
Muhammad Ali.

Have you ever given anybody food poisoning?
Not that I know of, but it can happen anywhere.

You're on death row. What do you request for your last meal?
A cheeseburger with double American cheese and a quart of Häagen-Dazs.

Something I should never buy at a large chain supermarket, only at a specialty store?
Fruits and vegetables. The quality and where it comes from are just not up to standard.

How do you tell if fish or meat are fresh?
You can look at the fish and tell if it's tired or not. If it's not sparkling and talking to you, saying, "I'm fresh," don't buy it. Chicken should also have that bright look, and no brown spots. Meat should have a very bright red color.

If you could only eat one ethnic cuisine for the rest of your life, what would it be and why?
Greek food. It's very healthy, and there's tremendous variety, with tons of flavor.

Favorite chef, aside from yourself?
Wolfgang [Puck].

Anything you can't stand cooking?
Anything that takes longer than an hour. I just don't have the patience. It doesn't excite me.

Five things I'd find in your refrigerator?
Hamburger meat. Butter. Mustard. Mayonnaise. Horseradish, for sure.

Worst kitchen injury?
Almost took my thumb off grabbing the blade of a Cuisinart. It was ugly.

If I showed up at your door one evening unannounced, what would you feed me?
If you were out at my house in the Hamptons, I'd probably make you a quesadilla in my pizza oven. I always have tortillas around.

Finish this sentence: Give a man a fish…
And have him cook it whole. Make slits an inch-and-a-half apart on both sides, rub it with fresh garlic, some olive oil, salt and pepper, put some herbs in the cavity and roast it in the oven at a very high heat.

Is Rachael Ray Satan?
Rachael Ray is very good at what she does.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY DAN WATKINS

INK-CORPORATED
O YA'S SQUID-INK SOBA PAIRS WELL WITH SEAFOOD

When my sister and I did something deserving—earned high marks on a report card or got through an embarrassing occasion, like the Chinese school recitals where we were forced to dance with chopsticks for some inexplicable reason—my mom → made us rice noodles in chicken broth, or chicken pho. It was an all-day affair. We drove from our manicured Orange County suburb to Little Saigon, a half-dozen blocks of storefronts selling fish sauce, shrimp paste, banana-leaf–wrapped dumplings and other comestibles the expatriate Vietnamese community needed to replicate their homeland.

My mom bought noodles and herbs from a large market, then went next door to a small shop to select a live chicken from the cages behind the counter. My sister and I stayed in the car, too squeamish to enter, mentally blocking out the process that turned the godawful squawks into the featherless, cleaned and bagged hen she brought back. At home, she started making the broth while we deleafed and washed the mounds of herbs for the first course: chicken salad. Wielding a cleaver like a vengeful kitchen deity, she dismantled the poached bird into legs, wings, feet and dark meat for the salad, reserving the tender strips of white meat for the pho. By the time she'd made the ginger-garlic dipping sauce, my stomach was growling angrily.

As we ate, my mom hovered over the stove, monitoring the broth and putting a pot of water on for the noodles. She swirled clumps of presoaked rice noodles into the boiling water, and seconds later, deposited the drained piles in bowls. My sister and I heaped on pieces of chicken, fresh basil and sliced onions before my mom poured the hot broth—suffused with star anise, peppercorns, shallots and ginger—over them. Chopsticks and soup spoons in either hand, we whirled through the bowls like dervishes, mesmerized by the solemn, ecstatic task of ushering those noodles into our eager bellies. We never got around to the third course, the chicken rice, or com ga.

Although my mom's pho was no Prozac, I've tried to recreate its analgesic effects any time I've felt particularly aggrieved or homesick. Which means I made a lot of pho in grad school. But, ironically, while my mom never rolled and cut her own noodles ("Too much trouble," she'd say), for many chefs, they evoke a hominess and care that customers especially appreciate. It's easy to find handmade pasta in Boston—casual and fine-dining establishments alike turn out egg doughs for tagliatelle, pappardelle, ravioli, etc. (Erbaluce and Sportello make some of my favorites.) Specialty markets, like Monica's Salumeria in the North End and Dave's Fresh Pasta in Davis Square, offer a wide selection daily. And home cooks with a hand-crank pasta maker (I scored mine at Goodwill years ago) can try it in their kitchens, provided there's enough counter space.

Noodle Lexicon

Lo Mein
Chinese for "stirred noodles," it's generally a soft egg noodle, tossed in a brown sauce with vegetables and/or meat.

Yi Mein
A flat Chinese egg noodle known for its spongy texture, a result of carbonated water in the dough.

Chow Mein
Chinese for "fried noodles," it's egg noodles fried, then combined with other ingredients.

Chow Fun
Large flat rice noodles sautéed with other ingredients.

ASIAN NOODLES are a different story in Boston. Ramen—not the Styrofoam-cup variety that sustains college students—is hard to come by fresh. Chef Yukihiro Kawaguchi of O Ya, whose parents owned a ramen shop in Japan, claims that many restaurants in Tokyo, including his family's, prefer to outsource their production to factories specializing in noodles. One reason fresh ramen isn't more commonplace? It requires alkaline salts (a combination of sodium carbonate and potassium carbonate, sold in some Asian markets as kansui) to impart its characteristic chewiness and yellow coloring. Alkaline substances mixed with oils or fat, however, yields soap. So mishandling them or messing up the proportions can produce a slimy, soapy-tasting noodle. Even Momofuku chef/owner David Chang prefaces his recipe for home-made ramen in his eponymous cookbook with a strong suggestion not to bother. "But, and this is a big but," he warns, "I really don't think you need to track down alkaline salts or kansui and make these noodles. Finding the ingredients is a pain in the ass." If you still want to try but can't find kansui, you can make your own alkaline salt by putting baking soda in a 250-degree oven for an hour. To satisfy a craving without resorting to instant noodles, Ken's Ramen in the Allston Super 88 Market food court, Men Tei in the Back Bay, Sapporo Ramen in the Porter Square Japanese mall and the Wagamama franchises all produce decent bowls for around $10.

And although udon, soba, chow and lo meins, and other Asian noodles are arguably easier

Asian Noodle Timeline

4000 B.C. First-known noodles discovered from this time period made with two kinds of local millet, in Qinghai, northwest China.

100 B.C. First-recorded mention of noodles in Asia appears in a Chinese poem, Shu Hsi's "A Rhapsody on Pasta."

200–200 B.C. Silk-road traders from the Roman Empire introduce the grindstone to China, popularizing wheat flour–making.

1000s The Japanese make their version of Chinese lo mein, which morphs over time into "ra-myun," or ramen.

Kimchi Udon with Squid, Clams and Mussels

SERVES 4–6

6 TABLESPOONS	CANOLA OR VEGETABLE OIL
4 TEASPOONS	SHALLOTS
4 TEASPOONS	GARLIC
1 POUND	MUSSELS AND CLAMS, CLEANED
1/2 POUND	SQUID, CLEANED AND CUT INTO BITE-SIZED PIECES
4 TABLESPOONS	SAKE OR WHITE WINE
1 RECIPE	KIMCHI UDON NOODLES (BELOW), BOILED FOR 25 SECONDS AND DRAINED
2 CUPS	KIMCHI
2 TABLESPOONS	SCALLIONS
	SALT AND PEPPER TO TASTE

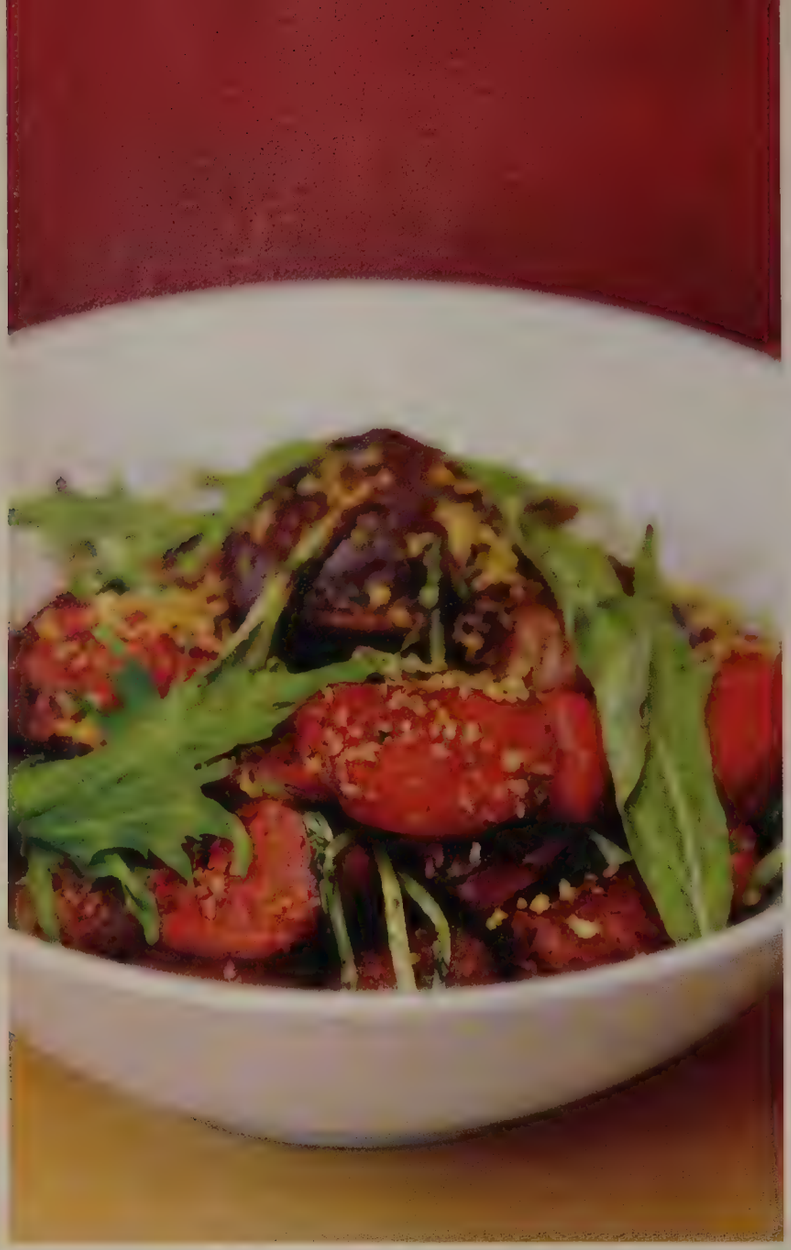
1. Heat oil in a large skillet or wok over medium-high heat. 2. Add shallots and garlic. 3. When fragrant, add shellfish, squid and sake. 4. Cover, then turn heat to high for a couple of minutes. 5. Add noodles, kimchi, scallions, and salt and pepper. 6. Toss in hot wok until noodles are coated and everything's mixed.

Kimchi Udon Noodles

1 CUP	KIMCHI LIQUID, STRAINED (MIX 3 OUNCES OF MOMOYA BRAND KIMCHI BASE WITH ENOUGH WATER TO MAKE A CUP)
4 CUPS	ALL-PURPOSE FLOUR
1 TEASPOON	SALT

1. Mix flour and salt in the bowl of a stand mixer affixed with a paddle attachment. 2. At speed 2, pour in liquid a little at a time until dough comes together when squeezed. 3. Place dough in a clean, large plastic bag and wrap tightly. 4. With your shoes off, knead the hard dough with your feet, using heels for added weight. 5. After about 10 minutes, remove the pressed dough and fold edges inward, overlapping them. 6. Return the dough to bag and knead for another 10 minutes. 7. Repeat the procedure again for a total of 30 minutes of kneading. 8. Remove the dough and let rest covered in plastic for 45 minutes. 9. Lightly flour the dough and work surface, and roll it out with a pin until it's thin enough to feed through the thickest setting on a pasta machine. 10. Roll through twice on thickest setting, then finish on one setting smaller. 11. Fold the dough, now about 1/4-inch thick, over and cut by hand into 3/4-inch wide lengths. 12. Place on floured baking sheets and cover with plastic wrap until ready for use.

to make, many restaurants—including Chinatown fixtures and Ming Tsai's Blue Ginger noodle bar—prefer to buy them from local manufacturers like Ho Toy Noodle Inc. on Essex Street and Sun Hing Noodle Co. on Lincoln Street. (You can find Ho Toy's noodles in Sun Sun supermarket, around the corner from the factory. Sun Hing's rice noodle sheets are available directly from their storefront; just ignore the signage declaring it's wholesale only.) Winsor Dim Sum Café is an exception; the small eatery makes steamed rice noodles, which you order off a checklist, and they're remarkable air-light wrappers for the sweet soy and shrimp.



A standout noodle-maker is East by Northeast's chef/owner Phillip Tang, who learned the craft firsthand in his parents' Chinese restaurant. Before opening his Cambridge eatery, he experimented by serving different flour combinations to his friends and family. "I think there's something very homey about it," Tang says of the process of handmaking fresh noodles. "It involves a lot of love. It's not done for convenience—a lot of labor goes into it. ↑ EAST BY NORTHEAST'S Short-Rice Noodles With Shiitakes and Sweet-Bean Paste

4 TABLESPOONS	CANOLA OIL
1 RECIPE	SHORT-RICE NOODLES
1/2 CUP	SHIITAKE MUSHROOMS, SLICED
1 ONION	THINLY SLICED
1/2 CUP	SHREDDED CARROT
1 CUP	BOK CHOY, ROUGHLY CHOPPED
1/4 CUP	SWEET-BEAN PASTE

1. In a sauté pan, heat oil until lightly smoking. 2. Carefully add rice noodles and cook until bottoms become lightly browned. 3. Add the shiitakes and onion to pan and sauté for 3–4 minutes until onion softens. 4. Add carrot and bok choy, and sauté until bok choy is tender. 5. Turn off the heat and add the bean paste. 6. Toss until everything's evenly coated.

Rice Noodles

2 CUPS	RICE FLOUR, PLUS A FEW TABLESPOONS TO DUST THE WORK SURFACE
1/4 CUP	GLUTINOUS RICE FLOUR
1/2 TEASPOON	SALT
1 1/4 CUPS	BOILING WATER
3 TABLESPOONS	CANOLA OIL

1. Combine rice flours and salt in a mixing bowl. 2. Add boiling water and mix carefully with fork or chopsticks until water is absorbed and the dough sticks together. 3. Add canola oil and work into the dough. 4. Allow the rice dough to rest for at least an hour covered in plastic wrap. 5. Lightly dust your work surface with rice flour. 6. Working with small amounts of the dough, roll into 1/2-inch thick logs, then cut into 1/2-inch lengths, roughly the size of gnocchi. 7. In a pot of boiling water, boil the noodles for 10–15 minutes or until cooked through. 8. These noodles can be rinsed and cooled to be eaten later or used immediately.

Chef Profiles

YUKIHIRO KAWAGUCHI

Although his parents owned a ramen shop in Tokyo, he only started making his own noodles two years ago at O Ya.

PHILLIP TANG

Before opening East by Northeast, he learned his craft at Hungry Mother and in his parents' Chinese restaurant in Virginia.

PATRICIA YEO

A New York transplant with much-lauded eateries on her résumé, she trained under Bobby Flay and now spearheads the kitchen at Ginger Park.

it's comfort food. But it's comfort food for other people, too." His short-rice-noodle recipe (see sidebar) calls for dough cut into gnocchi-like pillows, which are boiled, then fried for a crisp and chewy bite. Like fresh pasta, handmaking the dough allows Tang to create shapes and textures not available with manufactured varieties. The rotating specials might include lamb meatballs, green beans and tomato-ginger chutney over egg noodles, or chili-garlic cold noodles with eggplant and napa cabbage. Heartier, meatier sauces work especially well with his noodles, which he serves on the firmer side.

Tang tends to eyeball his measurements when making dough, pouring with the assured confidence of someone who can execute damage-control techniques on the fly. While the chef side of him strives for perfection, he fights against the fussy fine-dining urge. "There's a certain backlash against fine dining," Tang says, explaining why he gave up on his initial idea of marking each short-rice noodle with a fork, gnocchi-style. "We try to strive for homey, Chinese comfort food, but elevated."

In the precision category of cooking, O Ya's Kawaguchi gets out a scale when measuring the flours for his soba (I converted his recipe for home use; see sidebar). He learned to make the buckwheat noodle when a former employer imported a Japanese soba master to teach his staff. In Japan, it's not uncommon for noodle-makers to train for decades in their specialized craft, focusing their efforts on only one kind of noodle (soba, udon, ramen), but Kawaguchi doesn't claim that kind of knowledge. "I don't have any traditional equipment," he says, pointing to the hand-crank pasta machine he uses to churn out small-batches. Because buckwheat flour isn't derived from grain, he adds all-purpose flour to make it easier to handle. "Soba is easy to break," Kawaguchi says. "It's really hard to make it long. That's the key." His adaptable, simple style fits with O Ya's modern, experimental dishes; whenever he makes soba, he also makes a batch of squid-ink noodles as well.

For unconventionality, it's hard to top Ginger Park's Patricia Yeo, whose kimchi udon requires kneading—by feet. Instead of water, Yeo adds strained kimchi liquid (the pickling juice the Korean cabbage comes in) and uses a stand mixer to incorporate it into the flour. Then the tough, dense dough is wrapped in clean plastic bags and deposited on the floor, where it's stomped until malleable. Sous chef Kevin Burleson uses his 200-pound frame and size-12 (shoeless) feet to knead and flatten the solid brick. It takes him a good 15 minutes to achieve the desired elasticity, so he estimates at least double that for the home cook. Yeo realizes the process might conjure some unsavory associations in the minds of diners, and possibly health inspectors (which is why she hasn't discussed it before this article), but nevertheless stands by the quality of the outcome. As she should. The kimchi udon, served with whatever fresh seafood is available, is distinctive and delicious, its flavor punched up with sautéed kimchi.

The short-rice noodles, soba and udon reflect easy, medium and difficult recipes to try. Make them yourself when dry, store-bought varieties won't do. Or mom's isn't available.

Yoya's Soba

SERVES 2–4

1 CUP	SOBA FLOUR (1/4 ALL-PURPOSE FLOUR, 3/4 BUCKWHEAT FLOUR)
1/2 CUP	COLD WATER

1. Sift flour into a bowl. 2. While mixing by hand, add a little water at a time until dough just comes together. 3. Knead by folding edges into center and flattening down with base of your palms. 4. Shape into a patty about the size of a hamburger, then cover with plastic wrap and let rest for a few minutes. 5. Dust flour over dough and work surface. 6. Flatten the dough into a disc and, with a rolling pin, roll into a rectangular shape. 7. When dough is about 1-inch thick, cut vertically into fifths. 8. Feed each piece through the smallest setting of the pasta-maker and place delicately on paper towels, taking care not to ball them up. 9. Cover with another layer of paper towels and plastic wrap. 10. To serve, boil for no more than a minute. 11. Chef Yukihiro Kawaguchi recommends serving traditionally with soy, dashi, mirin, fish stock and sugar.

••To make squid-ink soba, mix 1 teaspoon of squid ink (sold in jars) with the cold water and proceed with recipe.

TEN UNDERAPPRECIATED DISHES THAT DESERVE YOUR ATTENTION

We finished our annual food binge a few months ago, anointing another batch of restaurants and dishes with the "Boston's Best" stamp of approval. The inevitable downside was that some of our favorites didn't make the list—proof that the local dining scene continues to expand and improve. With that in mind, we offer 10 unsung spots and their tastiest meals.

GRAN GUSTO

DISH TO GET: MARGHERITA PIZZA

Well done, Cantabrigians. Even though Neapolitan aficionados have been crying out for the thin, crisp and chewy crusts making headlines in other major metropolises, you've managed to keep this Huron Village trattoria all to yourselves. Until now. Sorry to crash your pizza party, but these wood-fired pies—with their fresh sauces and ultra-creamy mozzarella—are too good not to share. We also love the pasta dishes like scialatielli with shrimp, radicchio and cherry tomato.

LA MORRA

DISH TO GET: TAGLIATELLE WITH ROBIOLA AND FIGS

As far as we can tell, there's only one explanation for La Morra's generally low profile: location, location, location. Even though Josh and Jen Ziskin's northern Italian restaurant sits alongside a major thoroughfare (Route 9) on the edge of a busy borough (Brookline Village), it always feels curiously out-of-sight and out-of-mind. For those who've never been—or are tasting it again for the first time—consider this highlight reel: porcini-and-prosciutto–enriched meatballs, fried ricotta-and-Gorgonzola–stuffed squash blossoms and house-made tagliatelle with robiola and fresh figs.

(617-739-0007) LAMORRA.COM

MULAN

DISH TO GET: FIERY HOUSE SPECIAL FISH

Ever since shredded pork with mustard greens became the new beef with broccoli and hot pots eclipsed pu pu platters, Taiwanese fare has boasted a cult following. At this Kendall Square eatery, the draw extends beyond those particular go-tos (and the gratis plate of pickled cabbage). Other faves include creamy eggplant in a spicy basil sauce, fiery house special fish, and an addictive platter of plump shrimp, chives and sheets of bean curd soaked in a garlic sauce.

(617-441-8813) MULAN-MA.COM

You won't find divier digs... or a meal deal that rivals the sopes-gorditas.

PICCO

DISH TO GET: FISH TACOS

Plenty of people know Picco as a pizza place (rightfully so), but it has other pleasures. Recurring specials like the fish tacos have countless fans among South Enders, but the seasonal soups (celeriac, parsnip and apple) and pastas (pumpkin ravioli) also impress. The house-made ice cream (flavors include caramel swirl, cinnamon and passion fruit) is worth the tip on delivery, while families flock to the restaurant, which manages to pour both a mean beer for the adults and milk for the kids in cute cups.

513 TREMONT ST., BOSTON

RENDEZVOUS

DISH TO GET: MEATBALLS WITH TOASTED ORECCHIETTE AND MAITAKES

This is where we planned to remind you about Steve Johnson's culinary charms. Like how he grows an herb garden on the roof of his restaurant, how he commands an impressive spice cabinet from his years living abroad and how he reliably serves some of the smartest food in town (meatballs with toasted orecchiette and maitakes, honey-lavender ice cream). But The New York Times scooped us. We'd just like to add that this was our first pick for this story. That, and we're raising a glass to bar manager Scott Holliday and his concoctions, like house-made limoncello and cherry ratafia.

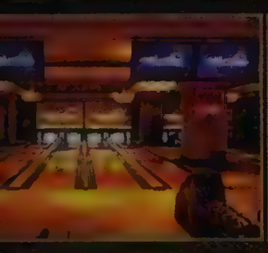
ROSTICERIA CANCUN

DISH TO GET: SOPES-GORDITAS



You won't find divier dining digs than Lionel Betancol's original Maverick Square taqueria—an enclosed counter wedged between two multistory buildings (his roomier second location sits around the corner on Meridian Street). You also won't find tastier tacos, creamier fried plantains, or a meal deal that rivals the sopes-gorditas. The hand-stretched masa shell—piled with roast chicken or

SUPER FUSION

DISH TO GET: OCTOPUS CARPACCIO

Sure, you can find grander venues (Fugakyu), fresher takes on makimono (Fish Market) and more pristine piscine (Oishii) in the Brookline vicinity. But locals frequent this raw bar for its affordable octopus carpaccio, massive maki and well-marbled salmon slabs. They also know to ignore its dubious-sounding name—there's not a lick of hybridized Thai or Korean food on the menu.

TABERNA DE HARO

DISH TO GET: GRILLED BASQUE SAUSAGE

A few years ago, a local celebrity chef opened a swanky tapas joint in the South End that won over diners with its bold food and drink. But we didn't forget the city's other Madrid-inspired venues, particularly Deborah Hansen's Brookline cornerstone. Taberna de Haro continues to trade on garlicky gambas, grilled Basque sausage, an encyclopedic collection of Spanish wines and sherries, and a delightful patio.

VINH SUN BBQ & RESTAURANT

DISH TO GET: CLAMS IN BLACK-BEAN SAUCE

Chinatown's beloved Hong Kong–style BBQ joint has never needed to rely on word of mouth. Its carnivorous window treatments—lacquered ducks, glossy slabs of char siu and chickens wrapped in paper—are advertisement enough. But there's plenty you don't get from a street view. Not just the meats chopped for vats of wonton noodle soup, but also an ocean's worth of stellar Cantonese seafood (clams in black-bean sauce), dry-fried chow-fun noodles, and a roster of coffees and teas that puts Starbucks to shame.

58 BEACH ST., BOSTON, 617-338-1368

LA MORRA
TAGLIATELLE WITH ROBIOLA AND FIGS

There's plenty you don't get from a street view.

VIVA MI AREPA

DISH TO GET: GRIDDLED AREPA

This isn't fast food, per se. In fact, the service can be downright sluggish, even when chef/owner Edner Trenteetun isn't cooking for a lunchtime crowd. But we promise that any foot-tapping impatience you feel while waiting for his griddled (or fried, but better griddled) take on the Venezuelan arepa is worth it. You'll be rewarded with tender shreds of oven-roasted pork and gobs of queso blanco spilling from the center of sweet-corn cachapas pancakes.

Hitting the Spot

Dr. Feelgood Haven't heard the buzz surrounding Sarah Ruhl's In the Next Room (or the Vibrator Play)? SpeakEasy Stage Company presents this Pulitzer Prize–finalist production chronicling the history of the fifth household appliance ever to be electrified (priorities!). Set in the 1880s, when medical professionals regularly massaged the "pelvic regions" of women suffering from hysteria, the comedy follows the aptly named Dr. Givings, whose family is disturbed after he begins vibrator therapy at home. Running through Oct. 16 at the Boston Center for the Arts, it's a hilarious, provocative show that shouldn't rub anyone the wrong way.

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Capsules by Sean Burns

The American ★★★ ½ A triumph of form over content, director Anton Corbijn's curiously affecting mood piece follows George Clooney's haunted, aging assassin as he hides out in the Italian mountains of Abruzzo. Synced to a different time signature than most contemporary thrillers, The American comprises long silent spells and existential dread. Cinematographer Martin Ruhe paints a lush canvas of verdant riverbanks and dim, foreboding nighttime streets. The anxiety in the stillness gets under your skin. Clooney isn't just getting more annoyingly handsome as the years go on; the sonofabitch is also becoming a better actor—simultaneously bolder and more restrained. The American calls to mind his heartbroken astronaut in Steven Soderbergh's underrated Solaris remake. Showing no trace of his gregarious movie-star persona, Clooney is gaunt and haunted. Often banished to the far corner of the widescreen frame, he methodically scans the surroundings for threats, never at rest. Playing a man with no past and no future, he lives only in the precarious present. Corbijn's impeccably controlled filmmaking hammers home the loneliness of this condition. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

Catfish ★★ What to make of Catfish? A Sundance sensation that purports to be a stranger-than-fiction true story, the movie doesn't ever feel like it's playing on the level. Is this all some sort of Borat-style performance piece? And if so, why isn't it more interesting? (I must tread lightly here to avoid spoilers.) An annoyingly overemotive young man named Nev Schulman works as a freelance photographer in New York City. One day, he's contacted by eight-year-old Abby Pierce, an art prodigy living in Michigan who enjoys painting portraits of his photos. Nev becomes a mentor to Abby, then, via Facebook, finds himself smitten with her entire family. We're supposed to buy Nev falling head over heels for Abby's 19-year-old virgin half-sister, sight unseen, but most of Catfish feels fake, as if Schulman and his coconspirators stumbled into a wild story and retroactively shot additional bogus footage to make themselves look like suckers for the first hour. (At Boston Common, Harvard and Kendall Square.)

Dinner for Schmucks ★★ Have wacky hair and false teeth ever made a performer more amusing? Or are they just the affectations of performers trying way too hard? Paul Rudd stars as an up-and-coming financial analyst who, after impressing his haughty boss, is invited to a special dinner party with the executive class. The only catch is he's required to bring an idiot that all these rich jerks can mock during the meal. Initially repulsed, the opportunistic Rudd suddenly sees a promotion in his future after accidentally hitting Steve Carell's loudmouth grotesque with his car. Every performance is hideously overscaled in this film, and director Jay Roach's unfortunate tendency to keep the camera within six inches of their faces underlines the strain. There's a pleading quality to Dinner for Schmucks that's the antithesis of funny, as watching talented people ham it up in pore-exposing close-ups inspires more pity than giggles. Why is Roach so hell-bent on turning such talented actors into prop comics? (In the suburbs.)

Easy A ★★★ With her barbed line readings and world-weary precociousness, Emma Stone has the poise and charm of a less tragic Lindsay Lohan. Stone runs away with this tart teenage riff on Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter. She plays a good girl pretending to go bad in order to enhance her social standing at a prim and proper high school that's lorded over by judgmental Christian kids. It's a welcome skewering of the promise-ring culture, with a game Amanda Bynes providing some gut-busting laughs as a messianic proto-church lady, and two sublime supporting turns from Patricia Clarkson and Stanley Tucci as Stone's hippie parents. Lisa Kudrow and Thomas Haden Church costar as faculty members boasting some suspicious extracurricular activities, while director Will Gluck is able to slip in satirical jabs without going over the top into message-mongering. The busy visual scheme is a bit much, as are the ubiquitous John Hughes references, but Easy A's a breezy lark announcing the arrival of a major star. It isn't quite Clueless, but it'll do. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Expendables ★★★ Some kind of meathead masterpiece, Sylvester Stallone's latest is cinematic junk food of the highest order. It's an old-school, men-on-a-mission movie that's so retro you'll feel like you should be watching it on a beat-up VHS tape. Both shameless and weirdly sincere in its dunderheadedness, the movie is a

Unexpectedly, Sorkin and Fincher make a successful pair.

The Social Network ★★★★
Starring Jesse Eisenberg, Andrew Garfield, Armie Hammer, Max Minghella, Rooney Mara and Justin Timberlake. Written by Aaron Sorkin. Directed by David Fincher. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

'WHY WOULD I WANT to see a movie about Facebook?" my dad asked me.

That's the question on the lips of many people not particularly interested in social networking. But then again, Citizen Kane wasn't really about the newspaper industry; it simply used a media magnate as an entry point to a story more concerned with loneliness and megalomania. "The Facebook Movie," as most folks have dubbed it, obviously aspires to be a millennial Kane, dropping allusions to Welles' classic while also roping in The Great Gatsby and Faust for good measure. It's an ostensibly simple story about friends who screwed each other over, and yet this film is shooting for the moon.

As far as pure, propulsive entertainment goes, The Social Network is a giddy rush of dizzying dialogue and cinematic curlicues. The unlikely pairing of florid, heart-on-his-sleeve West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin and clinical, profoundly dyspeptic Fight Club director David Fincher is unexpectedly revelatory. A 162-page script (Hollywood's usual formula dictates a-page-a-minute) blurted out in just under two hours, the movie is a barrage of intoxicating, rapid-fire chatter. Fincher is more than up to the task of finding sly visual counterpoints, and, on first viewing, you're often faced with the choice to either look or listen. The audio/visual virtuosity is almost overwhelming.

The story by now is legend. Nerdy outcast Mark Zuckerberg (fearlessly played by Jesse Eisenberg) gets dumped, drunk, then sets his campus on fire by hacking Harvard's undergrad "facebook" site and creating a "which chick is hotter" online contest. One evening of spurned, sloshed petulance spawned a multi-billion-dollar business.

Legal issues abound. Questions still remain, as to who was where for what reason and when, particularly with regard to a pair of twins (both played by Armie Hammer, thanks to some digital trickery), who hired Zuckerberg to code their exclusive Harvard dating site. The Social Network zips back and forth from dorm rooms to deposition rooms, spinning the story into two separate timelines.

> The film is a giddy rush of dizzying dialogue and cinematic curlicues.

But the movie isn't as concerned with legal ramifications or questions of authorship as it is with class differences and the idea of a level playing field in our technological age. It's a revenge of the nerd. Hammer's twins (amusingly dubbed "the Winklevi" by Zuckerberg) are the kind of handsome, moneyed bros some of us were unfortunate enough to meet in college. These dudes accept success as a birthright and expect everybody else to play by their rules.

Zuckerberg, with all his creepy, unblinking antisocial tendencies, stuffed a middle finger in the face of the Harvard old-boy hierarchy. He's a heroically petulant outsider (his Jewish faith is only obliquely referenced, yet figures largely in the saga nonetheless), and it's only when Justin Timberlake's Sean Parker, cofounder of Napster, clings on like a leech, and seduces Zuckerberg with dance clubs and venture-capitalist millions, that the Faustian elements of the tale begin to take their toll.

Timberlake, by the way, is extraordinary. Lit from beneath for maximum Mephistophelian overtones, he's the snake in the grass who's able to sever Zuckerberg's lifelong friendship with Facebook's cofounder Eduardo Saverin (Andrew Garfield), introducing our antihero to a late-night world of hot girls and bad drugs that the university had always walled him from.

"Every creation myth needs a devil," utters Rashida Jones' lawyer during one of the movie's more regrettable on-the-nose one-liners. Nobody will be surprised that Sorkin has a tendency to overwrite. But even clangers like that one are counterbalanced by the movie's keen empathy for its characters. I understand Zuckerberg is less-than-pleased with this portrait, but having watched hours of interviews with the world's youngest billionaire, I found him oddly sympathetic here.

The film's last shot is a doozy. Sorkin might as well be saying: "I'm sorry, Mr. Kane. But Rosebud has still not accepted your friend request."

A word to the wise: Be careful where you see The Social Network. Fincher and cinematographer Jeff Cronenweth shot the film on Red video cameras with extremely low light levels. But when I watched the picture at the AMC Boston Common, the theater screened this digital 2-D movie without changing out the 3-D lens, resulting in a severely dimmed image. Fincher, the technophile, would probably lose his temper at seeing his work rendered as murky soup. Filmgoers deserve better. ✖✖✖ relic from a crasser, ruder era before irony seeped into pop entertainment and ruined everything. Sly wants to party like it's 1986, when musclemen ruled the multiplexes, women existed only to be rescued and there wasn't a problem that couldn't be solved with a machine gun. Stuff blows up real good, and all the steroids and testosterone almost stain the screen. Stallone is clearly unconcerned with the demands of his so-called story, instead smartly structuring the picture so that it boasts at least one ridiculous action sequence per reel, culminating in a balls-to-the-wall killing spree. The Expendables is defiantly anachronistic and succeeds at being exactly what it wants to be. I haven't had this much fun at the movies all summer. (In the suburbs.)

Get Low ★★ Robert Duvall has made a career out of sounding the depths of that cuddly, incorrigible heart of darkness lurking just beneath the Mason-Dixon Line, and Get Low director Aaron Schneider trades on this shamelessly. The former Boo Radley stars as a Depression-era boogeyman who returns after 40 years in the woods with a giant wad of rumpled "hermit-money," determined to stage his own funeral. The only catch is that he wants to be around for the proceedings. Thank God then for Bill Murray, wryly playing a transplanted Chicago mortician with a penchant for top-coats and a tendency toward drink. The characterization in the movie is what works, with odd details that inform their backgrounds. But Schneider seems to see it otherwise, ramping up the melodrama for a shocking revelation that is neither shocking nor revelatory. Overdirecting in an amateur fashion, he hard-sells a quaint story to the point where a humble little movie feels like it's constantly puffing out its chest. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

The Girl Who Played With Fire ★★ This spring's surprise art-house smash The Girl With the Dragon Tattoo didn't do much for me, but I can understand its appeal. Based on the first book of Swede Stieg Larsson's best-selling trilogy, the film spiced up hoary CBS procedural tropes with dashes of tawdry transgression and chic exoticism. It was like an episode of Cold Case, but with subtitles, facial piercings and rape. The Girl Who Played With Fire, alas, is one of those sad sequels that removes everything anyone might've enjoyed in the original. Noomi Rapace's iconic damaged hacker Lisbeth Salander is framed for murder, and only her beloved, beleaguered journalist Mikael Blomkvist believes she's innocent. Cripplingly, the film commits the Jewel of the Nile sequel sin of keeping the two characters we came to see apart for the entire running time. Meager as Dragon Tattoo's pleasures were, the two leads worked well together. This time, not a single word is exchanged between them. Occasional e-mails just don't cut it, chemistry-wise. (At West Newton and in the suburbs.)

Going the Distance ★★ ½ In the cesspool of modern romantic comedy, littered as it is with grim vehicles for the unappealing likes of Jennifer Aniston, Kate Hudson and Katherine Heigl, this flawed but ultimately adequate film feels like a masterwork. A so-called chick flick that doesn't hate women and won't make you want to gouge your eyes out? Stop the presses! Borrowing more from Judd Apatow's sentimental gross-outs than, say, 27 Dresses, Going the Distance stars an irresistible Drew Barrymore as the oldest intern in the history of newspapers. The more she cusses, drinks and stuffs her face with buffalo wings, the more appealing she becomes. Freed from the prissy confines of most rom-com leads, she's a potty-mouthed hard-partier who isn't afraid to admit that she enjoys sex. It's impossible to imagine uptight US Weekly drones like Aniston or Heigl indulging in the kind of stoned lasciviousness that Barrymore gets away with here. She carries the movie on lusty giggles and F-bombs, handling both the movie's filthiest and most formulaic material with grace. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Inception ★★★ ½ Ever since his art-house smash Memento, writer/director Christopher Nolan has been obsessed with smashing up the syntax of conventional thrillers. Inception is the kind of pet project that could only happen in the wake of The Dark Knight, as Nolan scored a couple hundred million dollars by helming one of the biggest blockbusters of all time. Inception is an expansive, expensive brain-bender rooted in genre satisfactions; half Solaris, half The Matrix. Leonardo DiCaprio stars as a sullen corporate espionage agent slinking around Kyoto stealing valuable information by infiltrating people's dreams. Cleverly layered, the movie jumbles four separate realities into continuous sequences, as action scenes happen simultaneously across different dimensions but with the same characters.

It's a huge movie full of meaty ideas, even when the backbreaking ambition begins to feel like a grind. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Jack Goes Boating ★ ½ One of our finest actors and his own worst enemy, Philip Seymour Hoffman roars way beyond the boundaries of cloying schmaltz, directing and starring in this desperately cutesy adaptation of a play by Bob Glaudini. At his mouth-breathing worst, Hoffman stars as a stunted man-child who grows stupid dreadlocks and gets shoved into blind dates with Amy Ryan's cuckoo, damaged wallflower. Both are ostensibly adults who live in New York City, yet they carry themselves like idiot children at all times. The movie is fraught with condescension, as if this is how hip, downtown New Yorkers imagine the underclass. Hoffman's anti-social hyperventilator is too timid to do much besides whimper, cry and learn to swim in order to impress this woman who obviously just wants to have sex with him. Despite the frank drug usage and freewheeling infidelity by costars John Ortiz and Daphne Rubin-Vega, these characters all overdose on writerly quirks, never once behaving remotely like recognizable human beings. The endless monologues and cramped settings give away this tale's off-off-off Broadway origins. (At Kendall Square and West Newton.)

The Kids Are All Right ★★★ ½ Simply delightful. Director/cowriter Lisa Cholodenko's family farce stars Annette Bening and Julianne Moore as lesbian helicopter moms flummoxed by their kids' latching on to their hapless, sperm donor dad. Played with no shortage of comic brilliance by Mark Ruffalo, he's a bare-chested, groovy organic farmer with a hankering for instant gratification and a penchant for phrases like, "Right on." Complications ensue. Gently ribbing certain Whole Foods lifestyle choices that'll be familiar to anybody from California or Cambridge, The Kids Are All Right has a warm, randy spirit, which embraces these characters not in spite of, but because of their imperfections. Moore, in particular, hasn't been allowed to cut loose like this in eons. She's a lost New Age girl trying to get her groove back, while Bening's tightly wound wine aficionado scores all the haymaker put-downs. Cholodenko's last film was 2002's wonderful Laurel Canyon, and Kids hits the same raunchy comedic heights. In Cholodenko's world, middle age is a funny and sexy place to be. (At Kendall Square, West Newton and in the suburbs.)

Let Me In ★★ ½ Don't tell Stephenie Meyer, but sometimes vampire lovin' isn't so romantic. Matt Reeves instantaneous, entirely superfluous remake of Tomas Alfredson's 2008 arthouse hit, Let the Right One In, takes a dim view of interspecies swooning, as Kodi Smit-McPhee's bullied child falls under the spell of Chloe Grace Moretz's undead girl-next-door. Adopting Alfredson's stark, wintry compositions (sometimes frame for frame) while staying loyal to the muted latchkey-kid malaise, the Cloverfield director comes up with a dutiful exercise in movie karaoke. Too bad the film has no reason to exist. Besides slimming down the supporting cast and tinkering a tiny bit with the third act, Let Me In has nothing to offer that wasn't already available in its superior Swedish incarnation. Moretz is a scant bit more accessible than her animalistic predecessor, but otherwise this is secondhand material with no personality of its own. It's an awful lot of trouble to go through just because some people don't like subtitles. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Machete ★★ Based on a two-and-a-half minute trailer Robert Rodriguez shot for the 2007 mega-bomb Grindhouse, Machete stars B-movie icon Danny Trejo as a monosyllabic Mexican Shaft, sending up blaxploitation tropes with a Mexi-Cali accent. Like most Rodriguez movies, this one was shot on the cheap in Austin and contains enough wit and invention to entertain the audience for 15 minutes. Too bad about that last hour and a half. Robert De Niro embarrasses himself trying to send up a certain Arizona senator, but finds himself outclassed by a couple of startlingly game performances from Don Johnson (as a redneck militia madman) and Steven Seagal (as a crime lord wondering how he didn't get at least a cameo in The Expendables). Meanwhile, Lindsay Lohan gets naked, Jessica Alba is saddled with some ill-advised political speeches and all of Rodriguez's low-rent gore-hound fantasias never quite congeal into actual scenes. He should just make trailers. (In the suburbs.)

The Other Guys ★★★ Every bit the movie Kevin Smith's Cop Out desperately wanted to be, Will Ferrell's fourth collaboration with his Anchorman director Adam McKay is another take on the oft-parodied milieu of 1980s mismatched buddy pictures. Except unlike Cop Out, this film has actual laughs. Ferrell tones it down and actually acts for a change, playing a forensic accountant stranded on desk duty. Supercops Samuel L. Jackson and Dwayne Johnson get all the glory, destroying entire city blocks chasing down pot dealers, while Ferrell and his frustrated partner, Mark Wahlberg, chase down a much more insidious band of Wall Street swindlers. Even at his most restrained, Ferrell's mugging can grow tiresome. Good thing Wahlberg plays all this nonsense totally straight. He takes the role so seriously, you'd think he was up for another Academy Award. Marky Mark huffs and puffs as if nobody told him he was in a comedy. His reaction shots are better than any of the jokes. Nobody plays exasperation better. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Salt ★★★ We've come to that point in blockbuster season when simple competence feels like something remarkable. Salt stars Angelina Jolie as a poker-faced CIA analyst outed as a Russian spy by a mouth-breathing defector. Is she or isn't she? It's a question you ponder when studying Jolie's brusque, Sphinx-like performance, as the role slyly takes advantage of her odd, non-human characteristics. What's left is a propulsive 90-minute chase sequence, executed in high style by director Phillip Noyce, There Will be Blood cinematographer Robert Elswit and veteran editor Stuart Baird. A technical marvel, Salt is the rare modern action movie that cares enough to orient the viewer during the excitement, using long Steadicam shots and savvy edits where most filmmakers employ chaotic cross-cutting. The retro charms don't just extend to Russian baddies; the whole movie feels like a relic from another age, as commitment to craft trumps CGI bombast. (In the suburbs.)

Scott Pilgrim vs. the World ★ Based on the beloved comic by Bryan O'Malley, Shaun of the Dead director Edgar Wright's latest has an intriguing hook. In order to date his elusive dream girl (Mary Elizabeth Winstead), simpering Scott Pilgrim (Michael Cera, acting exactly like he always does) must first defeat her League of Evil Exes. Alas, Wright has little interest in the romantic aspects of this fertile idea. He's not really interested in anything besides pandering to his target audience with obscure pop references, protracted CGI fisticuffs and endorsing a worldview that can best be described as limited. It's like Juno for adolescent boys, at every turn reminding the teenage fans that they're smarter and better than everybody else around them. The moral of the movie is that it's OK to be an unfaithful, socially awkward, couch-surfing loser with nothing to offer. There's no coming-of-age here, just something deeply sad. (In the suburbs.)

Takers ★ Making a brief pit stop in the theaters on its way to Redbox kiosks, this comically derivative cops-and-robbers tale is a vanity project for producers/stars/felons Chris Brown and Tip "T.I." Harris. The wannabe music moguls cast themselves in a blatant knockoff of Michael Mann's Heat, borrowing the sleek suits and epic shoot-outs like a couple of little boys playing dress-up. The ridiculously overqualified Idris Elba (best known as Stringer Bell from HBO's The Wire) stars as the cool, calculating leader of a heist crew angling for one last score before retirement. Matt Dillon plays a cop-on-the-edge, and perhaps the only L.A.P.D. detective allowed to walk around the office in his undershirt. T.I.'s rogue ex-con gets out of jail with a "foolproof" armored car job, and everybody strikes dramatic poses against the glossy cinematography. Lacking a single original moment, the movie regurgitates massive chunks of True Romance and Mann's oeuvre. But Takers does manage to answer one question: How can you make Hayden Christensen even more annoying? Put him in a hipster fedora. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Tillman Story ★★★ Pat Tillman turned down a multimillion-dollar NFL contract to enlist in the army and serve his country. His sacrifice was rewarded with distortion, demagoguery and a chain of lies snaking up through the top levels of command. Killed by friendly fire in an accident the Bush administration sold as an act of valor, Tillman became an easy symbol for a government trying to foist an unpopular war on a weary public. But Tillman's loved ones wouldn't stand for that. Amir Bar-Lev's rousing, sometimes shocking documentary follows the Tillman family as they struggle through mountains of red tape and bureaucratic doublespeak to knock down the military's manufactured narratives in search of the truth. This is an angry film, but righteously so. The complex and brooding Tillman was used as a poster boy for a cause he'd lost faith in, and this documentary feels true to his restless, questioning spirit. (At Kendall Square.)

The Town ★★ The kind of movie about Charlestown that only somebody from Cambridge could make, writer/director Ben Affleck's latest symptom of townie street-cred envy is chockablock with dropped R's, Celtic tattoos and preposterous gangster movie clichés. Casting himself as the kindest, most-sensitive bank robber a gal could ever want, Affleck models a stunning number of local sports insignias and offers close-ups of his sculpted physique doing pull-ups. Adapted from Chuck Hogan's novel Prince of Thieves, The Town lurches from one dead-end plot thread to the next, piling increasingly absurd action sequences atop mawkish arias of self-pity. Mad Men's Jon Hamm trails two steps behind the gang as a distractingly scruffy FBI agent. Only The Hurt Locker's Jeremy Renner, channeling Jimmy Cagney by way of the projects, makes an impression, but even he gets short shrift in Affleck's maudlin climax that's half–Shawshank Redemption, half-naked narcissism. The final shot is the most unintentionally hilarious thing I've seen in ages. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Toy Story 3 ★★★★ So this year's summer blockbuster for adults turns out to be a contemplation of mortality and obsolescence starring a bunch of animated plastic toys. You might reasonably wonder if we critics ever get bored writing love letters to Pixar, especially when it comes to a long-delayed sequel that on the surface appears to be geared toward audience familiarity and 3-D price-gouging gimmicks. Yet these sons of bitches have done it again. Tom Hanks' cowboy Woody and Tim Allen's career-redeeming Buzz Lightyear find themselves put out to pasture once young Andy heads off to college. They're confined to a shabby daycare center that carries eerie echoes of senior-citizen homes across the land. What follows is a rousing jailbreak adventure with a tragic undertow, tackling serious questions of death and abandonment in a mature manner that would make Ingmar Bergman proud, if only he'd played with dolls. This is a treasure. (In the suburbs.)

Waiting for "Superman" ★★★ An Inconvenient Truth director Davis Guggenheim really wants to depress you. As if chronicling the impending end of the world wasn't enough, Guggenheim now sets his sights on our country's troubled public-school system with predictably dire conclusions. Slapping a giant "kick me" sign on the back of powerful teachers' unions, Waiting for "Superman" follows a handful of promising inner-city kids hoping to

I won't pretend that I'm knowledgeable enough on the subject to gauge the veracity of Guggenheim's blanket assertions, and I'm fully willing to admit that he's overlooking larger issues like systemic poverty and obvious societal inequities. CLASSIC SPIN

Mayer Hawthorne discovers his own soul as a singer/producer.

Mayer Hawthorne & the County play the Paradise Rock Club on Oct. 19.

Frankie Batista

MAYER HAWTHORNE didn't become a soul singer by design. "That was definitely never one of my plans," says Hawthorne, a DJ, producer and multi-instrumentalist. "[Singing] was something I was really doing in my bedroom so that I could sample it for making hip-hop tracks. So being known as a singer is really crazy for me."

The head of L.A.'s Stones Throw label, Chris "Peanut Butter Wolf" Manak, also found it crazy to believe that this preppy nerd was the crooning creator of the Motown-fashioned demos on his desk.

In fact, Manak thought they might be reissues, says Hawthorne, 31. "When I was finally able to convince him that it was me and that they were really my songs, and I played everything and sang it all myself, he was like, 'Holy crap, you have to do a whole album of this,' which is something I never thought of doing."

The result was A Strange Arrangement, a vintage-flavored 2009 release that won kudos from critics, as well as from Snoop Dogg, John Mayer and Justin Timberlake. Not bad for a lo-fi bedroom project where Hawthorne recorded his vocals through a set of headphones.

"When I first moved out to L.A., I was really scraping by," the Michigan native says from his adopted base since 2005. "I just used whatever I had around and, fortunately for me, using cheap equipment worked out—and sort of added to the sound that I was looking for, which was that warmer, older sound."

It was a sound he had absorbed as "a serious student of music," listening to countless hours of classic soul from Motown to Curtis Mayfield (whose falsetto Hawthorne evokes on "The Ills"), as well as hip-hop from artists such as beatmaster J Dilla, who recorded for Stones Throw. "I'm the kind of guy who will throw on a Smokey Robinson tune or a J Dilla track and just sit there and try to pick it apart and figure out how they were able to get that sound," he says. "What is it that makes it so magical?"

Growing up in Ann Arbor (on Hawthorne Ave.), Andrew Mayer Cohen was weaned on soul in the shadow of Motown. His musician father not only taught his son to play bass at age 6 but also brought him to work at a Detroit auto-parts store where they bonded over radio hits. "My parents used to buy me records," Hawthorne says. "That was their favorite thing to get me, and my favorite thing to get. All I wanted to do was play records all day."

He still finds the time to play records as a DJ, even spinning in Boston this past year. "I try to keep up my DJ game because a lot of people don't even know that I DJ, which is wild," says Hawthorne, who mixes hip-hop and soul with yacht rock, electro, house and ghetto-tech. "I've been DJing for so long, it's second nature to me.... I'm able to blend any genre of music that I want."

In turn, he's recording his follow-up to A Strange Arrangement with plans to expand on both his production and inspiration. "It's still going to be rooted in Motown and classic soul, but it's got to move forward," Hawthorne says, citing the Beatles, the Beach Boys and Steely Dan as influences on the CD, due next year. "I'm the type of guy who can't do the same thing twice."

But for now, he's back on tour with the County, his band of Detroit friends that helps bring his bedroom-crafted songs to life onstage. "Everybody has learned so much," the stylish, spectacled singer says of the group, which returns to the Paradise Rock Club on Oct. 19. "I've gotten a lot more comfortable as a frontman nowadays. I'm getting to the point where I can have a lot of fun with it, which is great, because that's what it's all about."

What began as a lark has become something much bigger. "I get to say that I make music for a living," Hawthorne says. "As long as I can continue to do that, I'll be so happy." ✖✖✖

Get Their Drift

Making Waves

Long adored by indie fans, Belle & Sebastian went mainstream with two tunes on the Juno soundtrack in 2007. Adding to their cultural currency, the band recently released Write About Love, whose title track features vocals from actress Carey Mulligan (An Education). Catch the pop group at the Citi Performing Arts Center on Oct. 15.

Behind Closed Doors

Home Sweet Home

Tom Grady explores both the beauty and complexity of everyday life in Domestic Bliss, his fourth solo show. From a plate of food to violence on TV, Grady blends the intimate details of the home's "sacred and profane spaces" in his paintings inspired by the 16th and 17th centuries. See his work through Nov. 12 at the Copley Society of Art.

Quick Read

Repeating Itself

Fitting for these tough times, The Quickening follows a feud between two farming families in Iowa in the early 1900s. With her great-grandmother's journal serving as a bleak, yet poignant, link to the hardships of rural life, BU professor Michelle Hoover's debut tackles the Great Depression with poise and delicacy. On Oct. 7, hear her historical take at Barnes & Noble Boston University.

Kelly Chiasson and Jennifer Lamb went to Seven Wells Waterfall in Malaysia. In the same descriptive spirit, that's the Really Big Rocks River.

Rachid Smairi visited Casablanca, Morocco, where he was shocked, shocked to learn that Rick's Cafe Americain is actually an awful tourist trap.

Jon Wells and Amanda Spittle visited a trapeze school in Los Angeles. Either that, or they're actually colobus monkeys doing an impression of "Improper" readers.

Avo and Houry Boyamian, Tom and Doris Harrington, and Sue and Neil Rutter went to London's Victoria and Albert Museum. (They're laughing at the "Prince Albert in a can" joke.)

FINE CHINA

The Emperor's New Show

Schlepping all the way to Salem was well worth it when the Peabody Essex Museum unveiled its exhibit, The Emperor's Private Paradise, Treasures From the Forbidden City, showcasing the contents of Emperor Qianlong's private retreat.

On hand to mark this auspicious occasion were assorted high-level Chinese diplomats (who thankfully kept their remarks briefer than most high-level diplomats do), along with local panjandrums like mistress of the Mandarin Oriental Susanne Hatje, culture vulture Jared Bowen, Skinner Auctioneer's Karen Keane and her other half, Dan Elias, MFA head honcho Malcolm Rogers and others of an equally sparkly ilk.

Needless to say, the objects on display were magnificent and everyone oohed and aahed appreciatively, one guest making the interesting and valid observation that more people saw the loot that night than had in the past 100 years.

The evening's most amusing remark: the woman who said, "That was just like eating Chinese food. In an hour, I'm going to want to see it again."

A Rose By Any Other Name

Behind every great woman are a bunch of other great women, and you couldn't swing a dead cat without hitting one at the Anti-Defamation League's luncheon at the Mandarin Oriental to honor Carol Fulp as 2010's Woman of Valor.

In addition to Fulp (a high-profile exec who was tapped by President Obama to represent the U.S. at the 65th United Nations General Assembly), there was ADL board chair Esta Epstein, previous recipient Linda Whitlock, the right reverend Liz Walker, Red Sox first lady Stacey Lucchino, the irrepressible Mary Kakas, adventurer and free spirit Linda Schwabe, force-to-be-reckoned-with Jacqui Budd, politico Andrea Cabral, Chestnut Hillbilly Kathy Taylor, philanthropist Carol Goldberg and just about every woman (and plenty of men) with juice in this town.

Meanwhile, one of the speakers tried out Fulp's new honorific, calling her "Madame Ambassador" and "Excellency," to which another piped in, "Just don't call her late for dinner."

Better Homes and Hangouts

How many movers and shakers can you fit into a $12.5 million, 12,000-square-foot mansion in Chestnut Hill? Well, it was hard to count.

Jared Bowen and Susanne Hatje at the Peabody Essex Museum

Dan Elias and Karen Keane at the Peabody Essex Museum

Governor Patrick and Carol Fulp at the Anti-Defamation League luncheon

Michael Schlow and Evan Deluty at One Starry Night

For starters, One Starry Night—a benefit for the Greater Boston Food Bank—was spread throughout the palatial house built by Mark Andrus and Marty Dykas. There was someone rolling cigars and a whiskey bar in the basement, a raw bar and a jazz combo in the garden, a tarot-card reader and jewelry designer in two of the second-floor bedrooms, and a Newbury Street art gallery exhibiting its wares on the third floor. Then there was the distraction of food by the likes of Michael Schlow, Evan Deluty, Tim Fonseca, Mario Capone and Andy Husbands.

Nevertheless, the eclectic crowd included such powerhouses as Brookline doyenne Diane Gordon and her other half, Lloyd, the stunning Alicia Winn and her hubby, Arthur, car czars Ernie Boch Jr. and Don Rodman, style avatar Omid Maxey, latter-day Warhol girl Brelyn Spindel, financial whiz-kids Paul and Wesley Karger, fashion plate Lisa Pierpont, iconoclastic thoroughbred Sukey Forbes Bigham, a guest who took one look around and said, "Nice little starter house," and another who got lost trying to get from the basement back to the first floor.

The evening's most priceless exchange: One person teased Boch, saying, "Why don't you just buy this place?" to which another added, "Yeah, Ernie. You're trying to downsize, aren't you?" ***

In Memoriam

In the history of the Four Seasons, the valets have never parked as many cars as they did for the hordes who came to pay their respects to the family of Joan Cutler, the Boston philanthropist and socialite who died in September at her home on Cape Cod.

A clear indication of how deeply she'll be missed, that statistic pales in comparison to the amounts of money she gave away with her husband, Ted, to such causes as the Crohn's and Colitis Foundation, Emerson College, the Greater Boston Food Bank, Boston Ballet, Silent Spring Institute and countless others, not to mention such civic-minded gestures as funding the lighting of the trees along the Comm. Ave. Mall (a charmingly extravagant gift to the citizens of Boston, and one for which the Cutlers received inexplicable criticism).

But far from being a checkbook Patron Lady Bountiful, Joan Cutler gave her time and energy, leveraging her connections and her fearlessness in asking other people to donate to worthy causes. And unlike many women who attend galas and benefits to see their names in print or climb some invisible social ladder, she genuinely enjoyed herself and was as friendly with the person who sold her the ball gown as she was with the society crowd she wore it around.

A tremendous light has gone out. Boston is a poorer place for it. And if she'd been alive to see all those cars being parked at the Four Seasons in her honor, Joan Cutler would've been incredulous (and slightly embarrassed) by all the fuss, and she would've said something along the lines of: "All this, and we're not even raising money for charity?"

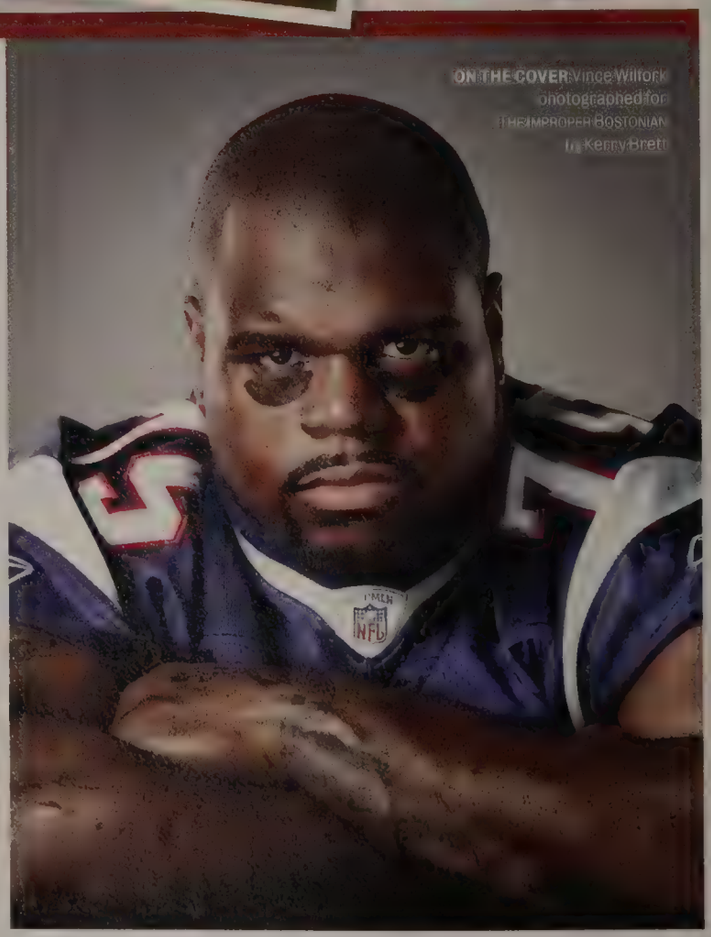
Nothing Ventured

My grandfather, bless his angry soul, used to say that the world is a venomous blob of minerals ruled by a sadistic God with control issues. Better to stay in your house, or best, a nice womb. He was right, of course, but travel has its uses. It can be enlightening. Public restrooms in Eastern Europe are a crash course in epidemiology. Mexico's drug-war zones are great if you want to confront your phobia of violent assault. And, if Gallup polls are to be believed, large swathes of our own country are rich grounds for the study of congenital idiocy.



The best part of traveling, though, is the chance to meet new people. I'm a better man for having sucked pints in a London pub with an agreeable tartlette from Grenoble, or for arguing Athenian politics with polite, Marxist Spaniards in an artist's loft off the Plaza de Colón. On the other hand, I'm hideously scarred by the memory of an elderly nudist gently fondling himself on a lakeshore in Oberbayern. So I guess it all balances out.

Travel's biggest downside is coming home. It's the ennui that comes from knowing that, although you may have blossomed with wisdom and experience, Gary in Tech Support is still wearing a tie that looks like he's been sick down his own shirt. Anyway, I'm tired of people coming back from Shanghai or Frankfurt or the inside of a volcano and saying how much more modern and efficient everything looks compared to Logan.

I'm told that Patriots tackle Vince Wilfork has come far. Michael Holley's story follows his journey.

Cheese, Improved

Chef Josh Sherman needs no introduction to the neighborhood. For the past four years, Sherman has manned the kitchen at Washington Square Tavern, where he and bartender Damian Dowling first joined forces. Now the two have struck out on their own with the Abbey, boasting a superior Scotch list and a kitchen that serves fried halloumi cheese (translation: upmarket mozzarella sticks). These dense slices of chewy, Mediterranean cheese are perfect for pan-frying, and they find an ideal mate in a cool, dill-inflected yogurt sauce. ELIZABETH BOMZE

Beauty

Trade Up

It's not easy to give your hair shine without weighing it down, or to give it volume without drying it out. Michael Albor, owner of the Loft Salon + Day Spa, feels your pain. As an educator, he's constantly on the lookout for new developments in the industry. Last month, Albor unveiled his Newbury Street space, where he carries a novel hair care line that he's sure will change the way we think of shampoo and conditioner. Even sought-after brands wash away your hair's essential oils along with dirt, but the Biomega products (from the makers of Aquage) feature a technology that bonds essential fatty acids with water to restore the proper nutrients to your hair follicles without adding build up. Lathering is no longer a trade-off.

TICO SUAVE

Michael Schlow's new venture

MICHAEL SCHLOW'S next restaurant, Tico, is under construction in the former Cottonwood Café space. Slated to open in early 2011, Tico will spotlight an American menu influenced by Schlow's travels to Spain, Mexico and Latin America. American steak with chimichurri sauce? Schlow's original recipes? We'll just have to wait and see.

IF YOU THOUGHT Cambridge's Think Tank was sunk for good after suffering a dramatic flash flood in July, think again: They're back in business, and "it looks great in here," partner Vincent Conte reports.

"Nobody could've predicted the flood," Conte says. "We took the brunt of it, with 12 inches of water" that ruined floors, kitchen walls and all the rugs, not to mention damaging the photo booth.

But now, it's business as usual with the addition of a new banner out front: "Think Again, Mother Nature!"

LOLITA COCINA & TEQUILA BAR will move into the former Papa Razzi space on Dartmouth Street in late fall. The focus is on "Mexican street food," such as ancho-orange-glazed lobster enchiladas (hey, what street are we talking about?) and tequilas. Make that hundreds of tequilas, including small-batch and artisan labels, as well as cocktails, of course.

THE RECESSION may officially be over, but ongoing economic trends are apparently behind the changeover at Newton's Ariadne. With the same owners and same chef, it's been reconceptualized as C. Tsar's (short for owner/chef Christos Tsardounis), a moderately priced Mediterranean spot featuring pizzas and pastas. All glasses of wine and house martinis are now just six dollars.

Wine

On the Rise

For years, South African pinotage was the wild, barking mutt of the fine-wine world. Unless your palate craved watery, thin pungent reds with searingly tart, untamed vegetal flavors, it was an experience best avoided. But just as every dog has his day, we're starting to see some reasonably priced pinotage enter the market as a viable fruit-driven alternative to its pedigreed parent, pinot noir.

This column is more a preview of coming attractions than a ringing endorsement: Pinotage is still a mixed bag of the good, the bad and the ugly. Despite a handful of stars (Kanonkop, Backsberg), the cost has been high and the style earthy and rustic. But the wine scene keeps evolving, vintage to vintage. Part of this unfolding story is an absolute quality revolution sweeping South Africa's vineyards. We first noted improvements in the country's shiraz and chenin blanc a few years ago, and, on the horizon, pinotage appears ready to follow suit.

This development is all very exciting, and there's no more enthusiastic organization than the Divas Uncorked, a Milton-based tasting club. In addition to running a festival on Martha's Vineyard (I've been a speaker twice), the Divas boast their own wine label, which features a very good Mendocino chardonnay and, now, an outstanding pinotage. The 2008 vintage won my recent blind tasting of the varietal hands down. The wine came and went quickly, so it's currently unavailable; consider my tasting note a lead for the 2009 vintage.

Bon Cap Pinotage Robertson, 2007 ($16, Stony Brook Wine, Jamaica Plain). This wine is made from organic grapes and shows more of the grape's earth-driven side. Juicy but also tightly structured and savory, it balances sweet berry fruit with a nice measure of tart acidity. Frankly, it needs a bit of time to open up in the glass and shows better a half hour after pouring. A good wine for mildly spicy Latin dishes.

Divas Uncorked Pinotage Western Cape, 2008 (no longer available). With a medium-deep garnet color and an aroma of toasted herbs, tobacco and wildflowers, this wine's lush, creamy texture sets the standard. The product of ripe fruit and low yields, it has concentration and mellow herb-accented red fruit. It's about balance and length, with understated berry spices lingering into an earthy, slightly peppery finish. As a middleweight, it isn't too brash for seafood or white meats.

Going Out

Making the Leap

Standing in the dimly lit cupboard that will soon be his kitchen, Jason Bond likes to think of all the French chefs who've abandoned starred restaurants to strike out on their own. It helps explain the incongruous sight of a cook who's earned national accolades dancing a compact ballet between a salvaged prep station and a stove weathered from years in a school cafeteria. As he observes, "I've been cooking for 20 years, but the banks don't care.

"I'm really excited about this," says the former Beacon Hill Bistro chef about a sink he found in a field. "It's not a glamorous TV kitchen, but it's a production kitchen where I can do what I want to do. It's an honest kitchen."

The digs are modest, but the plates will be ambitious. At Bondir, opening Nov. 1, the menu will change daily, "showcasing a few different ingredients that harmonize well together," says the former music major. Appetizers will include a beet salad; the root sous vide with spices, the juices jelled, bitter pistachio syrup and candied angelica served alongside. Bond's grandmother's chicken noodle soup will serve as an entrée, with his updated spin adding the hen's un-laid eggs cured and confited for a textural topping.

"I've known for a long time that I wanted to have my own restaurant, but having everything together, that's a big step," Bond says as he prepares to swap a tony neighborhood setting for a less conspicuous space just a few short blocks from his home. The tiny dining-room-to-be is crowded with paint samples and supplies, and the blueprints are drafted on yellow tissue paper. Standing near the cello he plays to calm his nerves, Bond adds, "I would've never left except for this exact situation." NICK ALTSCHULLER

Pasta Plan

Rachel Marshall and Leigh Foster noodled over their "dream-like" business plan for one afternoon before getting started. As coworkers at a furniture store, the two frequently recalled college semesters spent in Florence—and the fresh pasta they savored there. After getting laid off, they went for it. Now, more than a year later, they're hand-rolling their rich, eggy dough (made from local ingredients) in a shared JP kitchen. The wheat fettuccine speckled with ground flaxseed, for one, pairs perfectly with a browned butter sauce. ELIZABETH BOMZE

Drink of the Moment

Bait and Flip

"We were like, 'I wonder how he's going to take it?' He's either going to laugh or hate us," says Beau Sturm, co-owner of Trina's Starlite Lounge. Shortly thereafter, his friend Jim entered to peruse the new cocktail menu. At the bottom he found a drink created in his honor: Mr. Monahan. Only problem is, Jim's last name is Lane.

As a bartender at Eastern Standard, Lane is known for his flips. A newly minted husband, Lane married Riley Monahan earlier this month. Explains Sturm, "In the same vein of paying tribute, we have to be friends and give him a little jab."

Modeled on the classic Boston Flip, MR. MONAHAN → ($9) incorporates pumpkin puree, spice syrup and house-made bitters, and when combined with the meringue-like foam created from a shaken egg, the cocktail has a tasty, icebox-pie quality. Adding depth is 1 ½ ounces of seven-and-a-half-year-old Applejack and a dram of Boston Bual Special Reserve, part of a new series of Madeiras that reflects styles popular in the 18th and 19th centuries. Sturm says, "The cool thing is this is a throwback to one of the first cocktails, and it uses an ingredient that's been off the radar for years."

Plus, naming new drinks lets you take shots at your friends. "I'm down with it. I think it's great," says Lane, enjoying a sip of his emasculating homage. "Tested and approved." NICK ALTSCHULLER

BIKE MESSAGE

TO THE BELLIGERENT CYCLIST ON FRIDAY MORNING ON THE MASS. AVE. BRIDGE: As a cyclist myself, I'm mortified that you're on the loose, giving good cyclists a bad name. I misjudged pulling around a truck and blocked your bike lane while turning onto Beacon, but you had plenty of time to slow down. Instead, you decided to make a dramatic crash into the back of my car. I acknowledged "my bad" and tried to roll the window down, but you started hitting my car with your fist and insulting me. As you inched past my car, I tried to apologize again, but you spat on my windshield and berated me with every degrading female word your small mind could come up with. You shouted at me that "rules and laws exist for a reason, you dumb whore!" The best part was you rode right through the red light, flipping off the oncoming car that had to stop because YOU didn't obey the traffic laws. Get help before you mess with the wrong motorist. Anonymous

To the waitress who betrayed my confidence (and my burger):

There I sat, alone, in your crowded restaurant. As I awaited my friends, I noticed that there wasn't a table available large enough for the four of us. "Not to worry," you told me, "I'll let you know when the first table opens up." My friends arrived a few minutes later. We ordered a round, and then another, while we watched the party next to us settle their bill. Just then, another group intercepted our table, unmoved by our protests of "we were here first." When I appealed to your authority, you took the easy way out and split the four-person table between the nine of us. What's more, you took the usurpers' orders before our own. Then you ignored us for the rest of the night. Their burgers arrived five minutes later. Ours? A half-hour. Let your non-existent tip be a lesson to you: Gratuity is never guaranteed.

DRINK, NIBBLE, READ

An anthology of oenophilic tales and tidbits

AS YOU SIP A GLASS OF WINE, this book can be your literary snack. Jonathan Alsop serves up a year's worth of mini stories relating to wine; each day has a theme, from grape botany to food and wine blendings to tales of wineries and their founders. A grape is a temperamental princess flirting and battling with climate and soil, and Alsop describes the precise-though-dicey relationship between earth, sun and fruit. Alongside pictures of vineyards stretching out in luscious green stripes, he describes sauvignon blanc—meaning "savage vines"—with its impetuous growth on the Loire. In contrast, the rise of California and Washington wineries looks adolescently brash. He gossips mischievously about riesling (it's got sugar issues) and suggests rituals and games for studying and uncorking wine.

Wine Lover's Devotional 365 Days of Knowledge, Advice and Lore for the Ardent Aficionado
by Jonathan Alsop

Alsop is the founder and executive director of the Boston Wine School.

An aroma wheel lays out the sensory ingredients, but more yearningly poetic, and a tad droll, is the language of wine flavors. "Riesling is like the frosting on the frosting." Gewürztraminer's "rub is its funky, earth, slightly animal flavors." Another "smells like wildflowers, rose water and lilacs all at once." Yet another displays "stony minerality." Recipes include lavender crisps, parsley pesto and parmigiano black-pepper biscotti. The pictures are good enough to eat, or drink. ✖✖✖

FROM PAGE 190: "It is said that the Russian composer Alexander Scriabin literally saw flashes of light and different colors when he heard different musical notes. Neuroscientists call this phenomenon synesthesia, and Beatles albums and LSD trips are full of it: tasting colors, feeling sounds, girls with kaleidoscope eyes, and more. When wine lovers encounter new wines and eccentric flavors they've never before tasted, they fumble through the synesthetic landscape trying to connect what they taste with what's familiar."

WELL-TAILORED

Sam's is the right fit for one of the city's flagship stores.

QUITE A PAIR Fortifying herb-roasted chicken with family-style vegetables.

FOR MUCH OF ITS NEWBURY Street run, Louis Boston was home to a restaurant hyped as one of Boston's best. When I sampled the fare and service, I was underwhelmed. In fact, I was profoundly disappointed, a feeling echoed in my review, which ran under the headline "Louis Phooey!" No risk of that happening this time.

Louis' new Fan Pier venue sets the right mood, with water views out the wraparound windows. Strategically placed banquettes enable diners to watch airliners gliding into Logan and watercraft passing a few yards away. The space, accommodating about 50 patrons, has simple, clean lines with a high, open ceiling, tables of stainless steel and black vinyl, an eight-stool wet bar and side counters for dining overflow. Spare rather than opulent, it let the food speak for itself.

And speak it did, softly but persuasively. Soft butter arrived with chewy, fresh bread from West Concord's Nashoba Brook Bakery. A large bowl of beet salad with ricotta ($10)—the house-made cheese acting as a neutral foil for the warm, pleasantly sweet flavor of the beets—was too bland to make an impression. Steak tartare ($12) satisfied my carnivorous urge, its coarse-textured, tender beef studded with piquant capers and served with Dijon mustard, chopped egg and diced red onion. The hard, undistinguished croutons did not belong on the plate. One of my favorite local products, Island Creek oysters, freshly shucked and shimmering in their briny liquor ($1.50 each), came well-iced on a proper French coquillage pedestal, their accompanying mignonette sauce an unnecessary enhancement. Finally among the starters, the Scotch egg ($4), a large hard-boiled egg wrapped in savory sausage and served with tangy mustard and pickled shallots, made for a satisfying treat.

Mussels and fries ($16) featured small but flavorful mussels in a robust broth accented with chorizo, white wine, garlic and spices. The accompanying mountain of fresh, hot, herbed frites proved impossible to stop eating. Equally delicious fries arrived with the steak ($23). The beef, two coarse-grained slabs, perfectly charred on the outside while rare, tender and juicy within, had the intense flavor that makes this a bistro staple. Herb-roasted chicken ($22) covered the other standard bistro base. The juicy half bird featured crisp skin flecked with thyme, rosemary and marjoram. All Sam's main courses were accompanied by vegetables served family style. One night featured delicious pea greens and mushrooms; on another, more pea greens with sliced pears, quinoa and chopped yellow and orange peppers roasted to a subtle sweetness.

The only ordering misstep turned out to be our unimaginative choice of a brownie sundae ($8) for dessert. The unexceptional brownie came buried under an enormous scoop of vanilla ice cream covered with a gummy chocolate sauce. It tasted fine—in fact I finished it off despite my earlier encounter with the unstoppable fries—but the experience was totally forgettable.

Sam's wine choices afforded some pleasant surprises. Cusumano nero d'avola, a red from Sicily ($8 a glass), exhibited lush fruit in a decently structured wine, while the Argentinian Santa Ana Torrentes ($7) was marvelously refreshing with fruity, palate-pleasing acidity. A glass of Nino Franco prosecco ($10) was good as far as it went, which wasn't far, so skimpy was the pour.

Attentive, accommodating waitresses supplied impeccable service on both visits. The restaurant's co-owner, Esti Parsons, formerly of Radius, recognized me one night, and after we discussed the bread, I found a few extra slices in the doggie bag carrying my leftover mussels. They proved a suitable reminder of a very enjoyable restaurant. ×××

WELL HUNGOVER

The agony of drinking in your 30s

Read more at improper.com/blogs

ONCE UPON A TIME—SAY, college and the five years thereafter—I'd only get a hangover if I really worked at it. And there were certainly times when I got what I deserved. Like the morning after the Captain convinced me to press ham against the glass at a hockey game and then run shirtless out into the winter night while being chased by security. That hangover, I earned.

But drinking habits change. Right out of college, when you'd go to the doctor and he'd ask how many drinks per day you have, you'd say, "None, Sunday through Thursday. As for Friday and Saturday, I don't count them. What do I look like, a freshman?"

Eventually, the pattern changes. You don't have those big nights as often, and your body adjusts its tolerance downward. It's a subtle process, and one that you don't really notice until you unwittingly exceed your new, lower limits.

I learned about my new hangover threshold last summer, when my brother-in-law, Rick, invited me to a weekend-long golf tournament. Each year, his friends convene for the Chilly Mac Cup, which consists of golf interspersed with whiffle ball, grilling, beer pong and other contests of athleticism. There's an impressive video of one Chilly Mac participant chugging a beer and then executing a running forward-flip over a medium-size hedge. Each participant is provided with a commemorative stein shaped like a boot. It's a well-run program.

This is a two-day event, so I decided early on that I'd take it easy on Friday—it's a rookie mistake to go too hard on the first night and ruin yourself for the next day. On Night One, I'd phantom out early.

The challenge of phantoming is that you don't want to get caught. And I was bagging early enough that I'd definitely be mocked if anyone noticed me leave—we're talking about 9:30 pm. So instead of trying to score a bed in the house, I retreated to the car I was driving as part of my auto-reviewing duties: a four-door Jeep Wrangler Rubicon. The Wrangler is a lot of things—off-road champ, summer convertible, a vehicle that is somehow both a chick car and a meathead-mobile—but it is emphatically not a Sealy Posturepedic. I awakened at 6 am feeling like I'd spent the night inside a barrel filled with conch shells that was dragged across the actual Rubicon by doped-up pack mules.

They say it takes seven years for your college drinking habits to change.

I found Rick inside the house, curled up on a couch. "Why didn't you sleep at one of the other houses?" he asked. "There were empty beds a couple blocks away." Other houses? When I'd picked Rick up the day before, he wasted no time telling me his new favorite joke. ("What's red and smells like blue paint?... Red paint!") But over the subsequent two-hour drive and 18 holes of golf, he neglected to mention that the Chilly Mac Cup included more than one house. As I attempted to straighten my buckled hobbit legs and remove the right angle from my neck, I mentioned that this would've been good intel to have.

We proceeded to the golf course, a gathering feeling of unease settling over me. You know you're getting a hangover when certain unremarkable sights become unreasonably disturbing. You'll drive past a medical supply store and see some giant stainless-steel bathroom device in the window, and the sight of it will suddenly trigger a sense of impending doom. On this particular day, I think it was a poster advertising a fast-food breakfast sandwich that sent me into a funk. How do they make those eggs so fast? Is that pallid yellow patty even chemically related to eggs at all? They microwave it. Blug... Vurp...

By the time we teed off at the second hole, I realized I was in the grips of a creeper hangover—the kind where you wake up and feel OK, then gradually admit that you're not OK at all. By the third hole, I was heading for the bushes. Where I hurled, much to everyone's delight.

I gutted out the rest of the front nine, stopping every couple holes to dry heave. After nine holes, I bid the Chilly Mac adieu, heading home with my head bowed in shame and confusion. I'd called Heather before I retreated to Hotel Wrangler, and she confirmed that I didn't sound drunk. What happened? It used to be that I could get drunk without getting a hangover. Now I can get a hangover without getting drunk.

They say it takes seven years for your college drinking habits to change. I say it took 11 years for my drinking habits to come full circle—back to early in my freshman year of college, when four beers would constitute a big night. Well, that's the case once again. Trust me, I counted. ✖✖✖

WOMEN'S WISDOM

Take female advice to heart.

I'VE HAD HUNDREDS OF SINGLE, female clients during my years in the investment business. And I have close gal pals who've taught me countless things. Men should make a point of having several key women in their lives, not just romantically, but as friends. Here's a brief introduction to the wisdom I've gained from these relationships.

If we're lucky in life, we know people in their 80s who seem younger than people in their 40s. Such a person is my friend Sylvia. It's an old-fashioned name, but she's more modern and original in my view than Lady Gaga. I've had a crush on Sylvia for a long time, dating back to when I was a junior counselor at a boys' camp in Maine and her son was in my charge. This was long before the concept of the "cougar." But, like Jimmy Carter, I lusted in my heart.

Years later, we became friends when she was working in the retail business. "I can sell more clothes than anyone in this store," she told me, "because I'm good to people. I'm interested in them and their stories. When you get people to talk about themselves, they will buy much more than they thought they would. If you're a good listener you can be a great salesperson." She also taught me to "keep relationships and friendships fresh." She does this by sending little notes with thoughts on life. Some of her notes have read, "I'm looking for a dirty old man with a clean body." And "most of the frogs you kiss never turn into princes."

"To get somewhere in life," she said, "you [have] to make yourself memorable." Some years ago, she came into my office wearing a painted, wooden sign around her neck that read, "Be Good to Me, I'm Old." Another time, she wore dark glasses and held a tin cup in her hands full of sharpened no. 2 pencils. Next to her, she'd placed a toy dog with a silver chain around its neck. "I won't have to sell pencils, will I?" she asked sheepishly. Stock markets had been soft and anxious, and Sylvia wanted to make sure I was paying attention.

For a famous psychiatrist's birthday, Sylvia bought a large glass head, open on the top. She filled it with nuts and presented it to him. For a favorite cousin's anniversary, she bought a whole tongue (the cousin's favorite food) at a kosher butcher shop. Then Sylvia put together a papier-mâché head, complete with mop strings for hair and a generously wide mouth, into which she placed the deli tongue, sticking out grotesquely. "Keep 'em guessing what's next," she advised me, adding, "I don't know about you, but I've put in my will that I want my ashes scattered somewhere in Neiman Marcus. To be eternally aware of when they run the sales."

Another woman is my really street-smart lawyer. I'll call her Barbara. I used to refer all clients and friends who needed savvy advice to her, until she became a judge; sad day for me. "You know what quality is the most difficult to find in America today?" she asked me. "Common sense. Everyone is afraid to cut through the nonsense. No one wants to make the effort to simplify things. Well," she continued, "a wise guy once told me, 'Dress British, think Yiddish.' It helps to appear to be something you're not. It puts people off balance and allows you to win. Contrast is the key."

When I first met Barbara, I questioned whether everything was a contest with her. She looked at me as if I were an idiot. "Hey, what's the matter with you? Every day, if we're good at what we do, we go to war. Did you ever hear of the battle of the sexes? It's eternal. Thirty years ago, the man of the house gets up, goes into the bathroom: clean towels, clean socks to put on. He comes down to a hot breakfast, and he tosses his wife the keys to the car. 'Take me to the train, honey, and take the car for service, standard lube, no big deal.' He goes off to work, has lots of give and take, his wife picks him up at the train. She has dinner cooking, and when they get home, she tells the kids to be quiet because daddy needs to unwind. Now it's all changed. If I were a guy, I'd fight to the death not to give this up. The poor bastards are confused, and they resent giving up the greatest deal on Earth."

Here are some of her guidelines on legal and life matters.

1. "Unless you're a nuclear physicist, you need human interaction. And remember, in that interaction the most important quality is a sense of humor. Because people are really terrified of each other."

2. "We are not practical people; we believe what we see on the screen. I've handled hundreds of divorce cases, and I know that marriage is something you have to work at every day. American men won't believe that you cannot just marry for love."

3. "Never overlook the obvious in dealing with people on any level. Tip O'Neill once asked a woman in his district if she voted for him. 'No,' the woman said to the long-time congressman.

'Why not?' asked the surprised O'Neill.

'You never asked,' the woman answered."

4. "Talk to people you need something from as if it's their problem. I call an assistant to an eye doctor for instance and tell them, 'You sound like the only really intelligent person I've talked to all day. Well, thank God, because my eyeballs are falling out.' You involve them by complimenting them. We all want to be stroked."

5. "If you can tell a joke, you'll always sell more tomatoes than anyone else."

6. "When I prepare for trial, I shut my door, forbid all phone calls, sit for two hours and think about the case and about what the other lawyer is doing. Because I focus on the real issue... I want the jury to give my client money."

7. "Find out if your lawyer is on any big case at the time you consider retaining him or her. Prior commitments can put you on the back burner."

8. "Don't overreact. If all I want is a man to tie a slipknot, I don't have to go to bed with him."

Barbara called recently to talk about the stock market. After chatting awhile, I asked her if she'd seen the press or TV coverage about a female state senator's son arrested for throwing a wild party at his mother's house while she was away on vacation. There were liquor and drugs present, and all the kids were in high school. The state senator was in the news a good deal. "As a matter of fact, the newspapers called me to comment," she said. "I told them I'd give them a reaction if they printed it exactly as I stated. They said they would, so I told them, 'It's got nothing to do with the state senator. Don't you know that all teenage boys are assholes?'"

ON SHAQ, BRANCH AND LITTLE FAVRE

5 CELTICS OVER/UNDERS

Kevin Garnett's Points Per Game: 15.5 Watch Kevin Garnett run down the floor a couple times, and you can see that he's feeling better. But it's his off-the-court attitude that's probably the best indicator of his overall confidence and strength. He's laughing, cracking jokes, allowing himself to be filmed dancing with a shirtless Big Baby. He's having the time of his life, and that can only mean that the knee is finally healthy. Bet: Over

SIXTEEN PPG? Anything's possible

Shaquille O'Neal's Games Played: 65 Our first clue was when Doc named Jermaine O'Neal the starting center. Our second was when Shaq sat out a preseason game with a sore hip, leading Doc to say, "Yeah. That will be an on-and-off issue at times." And our third clue was... OK, there's no third clue, but the point is that the C's are going to take it slow with Shaq this season. And even then, he'll fight through some serious aches and pains. Shaq's Icy Hot sponsorship should come in handy. Bet: Under Rajon Rondo's Assists Per Game: 10 Rondo finished last season 16 assists short of a 10-per-game average. And when you factor in missed Big Baby layups, busted KG alley-oops and all the possessions wasted by Rasheed... ah, what could've been. So will this be the year he reaches the heralded point-guard plateau? Nah. Not for lack of talent, but as a result of fewer minutes. Bet: Under

Total Player Technicals: 54 (Last Year's Total) In the preseason, officials were more sensitive than Kanye West, but that won't carry over into the real thing. I'm convinced that David Stern tells his refs to be extra horrendous in exhibition games, so their regular season ineptness doesn't look as bad. That, plus Sheed's retirement and Perk's injury, equals... Bet: Under

Celtics Total Wins: 53 Last year, the C's proved that they could pee all over the regular season and still come out (almost) on top, but the memory of playing Games 6 and 7 in Los Angeles will keep them focused on home court. Will there be injuries? Of course. They're old! But this time they have the depth to overcome. Bet: Over

1 ONE FINAL THOUGHT

Last spring, Boston came excruciatingly close to seeing both the Celtics and the Bruins reach their conference finals. It would've been the first time since 1988. But if I were a gambling man—clearly, I'm not—I'd bet that this is the year both teams hold up their side of the bargain.

4 DATES TO WATCH

10/24: The Pats head west to take on the Chargers. Man, it's going to feel weird when the fourth quarter rolls around and LT's not there crying on the bench.

10/26: NBA Opening Night—the C's take on the Heat in a battle of the Big 3s! Delonte West will be watching from home... but with whom?

10/28: The Maple Leafs come to Boston, but will the Phil Kessel hate still exist? The more Tyler Seguin thrives, the harder it is to care about Kessel.

10/31: Randy Moss and the Vikings celebrate Halloween with the Pats. The Krafts better go ahead and ban "Brett Favre's Penis" costumes before it's too late. Speaking of which...

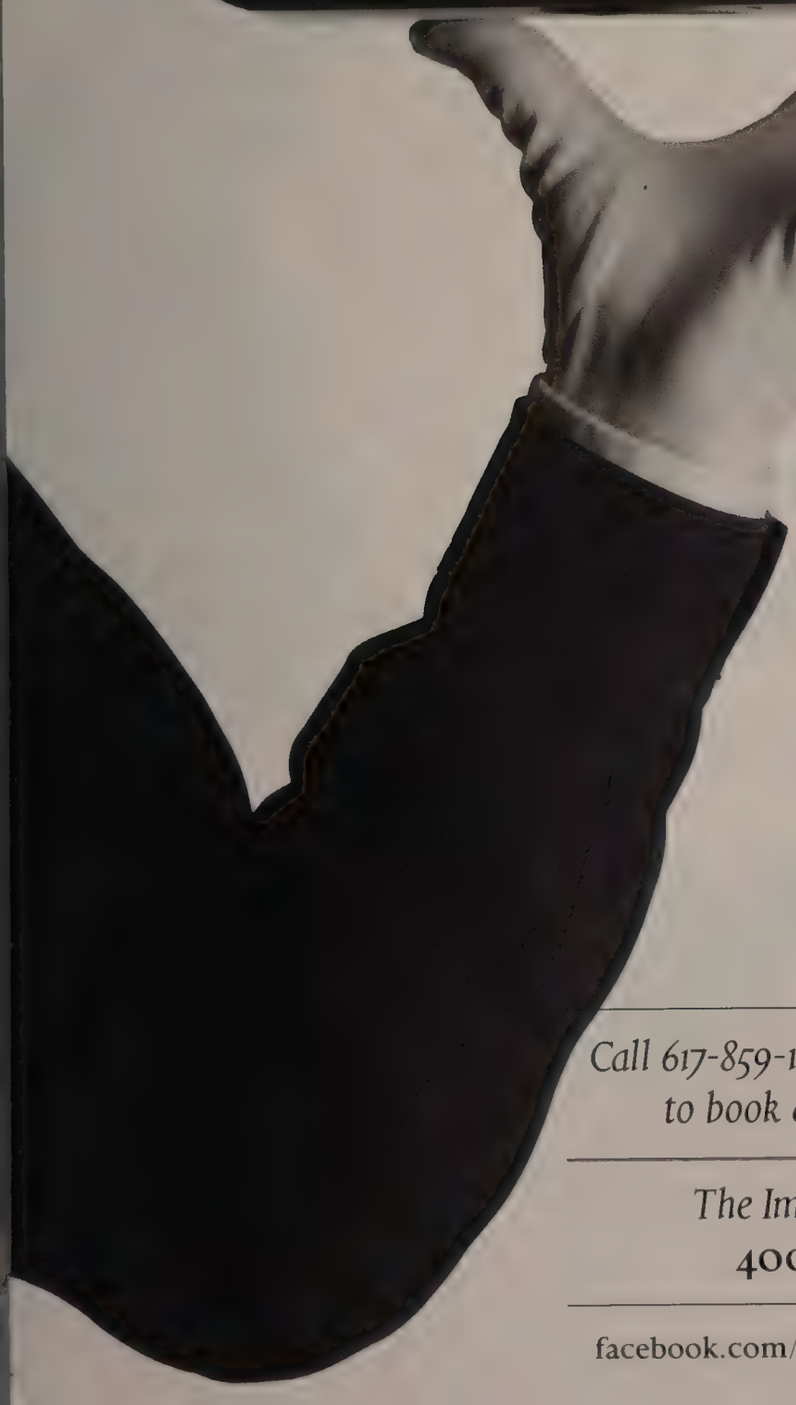
SEND FEEDBACK TO RICH@IMPROPER.COM AND READ MORE AT CSNNE.COM.

3 Halloween Costume Ideas

For Couples Put on a green ogre mask, a pair of brown tights, a white potato sack and a brown vest. Then you have your girlfriend hop in a donkey costume. Tell people you're Glen Davis and Nate Robinson.

For Smokers Put on a No. 9 Celtics jersey, and then walk around ripping butts and speaking with a Croatian accent. You're Dino Radjon Rondo.

For Irony Step 1: Grab a team hat and windbreaker from the Pats pro shop. Step 2: Head to a party. When someone asks whom you're supposed to be, say, "I'm Patriots wide receivers coach Chad O'Shea." Become offended if they don't find this hilarious.



2 FOR THE PATS

Branching Out I love the move to bring back Deion Branch. Not only for the nostalgia, but for what it means for Brandon Tate. With Branch around, Tate can continue to focus on becoming one of the league's top kick returners, without the pressure of also being the team's no. 2 receiver.

Bill Hearts Devin It's rare that you hear Bill Belichick go to any lengths to commend one of his players. And if you're talking about a rookie, there's a better chance of BB breaking into an a capella version of "Living on a Prayer" than there is of him laying on serious praise. However, Devin McCourty is a major exception. I think the coach might have a little man crush. And, as weird as it sounds, that gets me excited.

"I consider myself to have a sensitive, unsophisticated nose."

Soroff On EVELYN LAUDER

The cosmetics queen and philanthropist talks about cologne spritzers, space-age skin cream and Elizabeth Hurley.

WONDER WOMAN EVELYN LAUDER IS A COSMETICS executive, photographer, cookbook author, philanthropist, hostess and tireless crusader against breast cancer. She launched the pink ribbon as a symbol of breast health and founded the Breast Cancer Research Foundation. (October is Breast Cancer Awareness month.) A recipient of France's Legion d'Honneur, she is married to Leonard Lauder and works for the company founded by her mother-in-law, Estée. She has published two volumes of her photography, which has been exhibited internationally at galleries from New York to Paris to Beijing. She lives in New York.

Jonathan Soroff: Isn't being a Renaissance woman exhausting?
Evelyn Lauder: [Laughs.] It is. I'm pooped. But I love doing different things. I love the creative process with photography. I love the family business. I love to entertain. And I'm passionate about finding a cure for breast cancer.

Do you really think it's possible to come up with a cure for breast cancer in our lifetime?
Oh, sure.

What's the biggest recent breakthrough?
There are new drugs, better screening methods, shorter treatments and better outcomes.

How'd you come up with the pink ribbon?
It was conceived by Alexandra Penney, the editor-in-chief, at the time, of Self magazine. There was the red ribbon for HIV/AIDS, and she put a pink ribbon on the cover. I called the president of Estée Lauder and said, "This is a great idea. We have to start making them."

Is beauty in the eye of the beholder?
No. If you feel good about yourself and smile, if you've got a lovely personality and are nice to other people, then you're beautiful.

Who is the most iconic face of Estée Lauder?
I have a particular fondness for Elizabeth Hurley because she, to me, epitomizes the modern woman. She's extremely beautiful physically, but she also happens to be very bright, extremely articulate, and she's sympathetic to a lot of things I believe in. She loves organic gardening. She's attuned to maintaining the balance of nature. She's an entrepreneur. Her lifestyle is one I connect with emotionally.

What defines a good photograph?
Light. Composition. The way your eye is drawn to the subject. When I look at my pictures, I always ask, "Where is the poetry?" If I don't see poetry, I don't do anything with it.

Biggest makeup mistake most women make?
They don't use the right kind of cleansers so the face isn't set up to take the best of the ingredients in cosmetics and use them. You need to refine the skin and nourish it.

Favorite fragrance?
That's like asking which is your favorite child, because fragrance development reports to me. I love every fragrance in our family, and I'm involved in all of them. I consider myself to have a sensitive, unsophisticated nose.

Were you intimidated by your mother-in-law?
No. She was my mother-in-law long before anyone had ever heard of her. I think when I married Leonard, she was at Saks, Lord & Taylor and Bonwit Teller.

Was she competitive with Helena Rubinstein?
No. Helena Rubinstein was much older. The real competition was between her and Charles Revson. And that was fun. He was a riot. I remember a buyer saying to my husband, "Why don't you do nail polish?" He mentioned it to my mother-in-law. She said, "Right now, Charles Revson thinks I'm a dumb, cute blonde and doesn't really know I exist. If I move in on his territory, he's gonna kill us." So we didn't do nail polish for many years.

So it was Revlon vs. Estée Lauder?
We had offices in the same building, and I'd always say, "Good morning, Mr. Revson," and he'd just look right through me.

I object to the phrase "a free gift with every purchase." A gift, by definition, is free.
I agree. We always say "a gift with a purchase." We started that by giving a compact to everyone who came to the counter. We didn't have enough money to advertise. So we did it by giving away a gift. Then the banks copied it.

What other ways did you sway customers?
With fragrances, we'd suggest someone try it before buying it, and we'd always put it on the right wrist, because we knew that most women would brush their hair with that hand and smell it again later.

The cologne spritzers in department stores are as annoying as mimes.
[Laughs.] In the old days, we even had a whiff that sprayed into the air when the person opened the door, but we stopped that when we realized that a lot of people are allergic.

Who thinks up the names of cosmetic colors?
We have to, first of all, make sure that no one else owns the name, so there's a clearinghouse we go through. Ours tend to be less outrageous than some other companies'.

Does the cosmetics industry portray women in an objectified way?
No, but we do have very young models, because whenever we've used older models, they weren't as successful. We did have an ad with Karen Graham, 25 years after her last modeling job to promote the same cream. People could see how well she aged using that cream.

Isn't it all just hope in a jar?
No. Today, the pharamacopia is so sophisticated. We've tested the ingredients with radioactive isotopes developed by NASA to determine how the skin absorbs things. We have ingredients we know penetrate the epidermis. We can't go beyond that in our claims because once you get to claims concerning the dermis, it becomes a drug. But we know that our repair process really works.

What three things are indispensable?
A lipstick, blush and eyeliner. If I'm at a movie or a show and I burst into tears, I can fix it.

How do you feel about Botox and plastic surgery?
Remember what Tallulah Bankhead once said? "They aren't making mirrors like they used to." [Laughs.] If you're safe, and they're used with a light touch, they're fine. ✖✖✖

THE DEFENSIVE LINE

FAMILY MAN

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF NEW ENGLAND'S TOUGHEST TACKLE

BY MICHAEL HOLLEY / PHOTOGRAPHS BY KERRY BRETT

ON AN AUGUST NIGHT IN 2001, two people who had never met—each of them unaware that the other existed—went online at about the same time with essentially the same thought. I'm not looking for anything serious. The website was Blackplanet.com, and neither 19-year-old Vince Wilfork (aka "heyhey75") nor 23-year-old Bianca Farinas ("miamib") went there thinking that he or she was clicking on destiny.

Bianca was in Homestead, about 30 minutes from Miami, on the site posting pictures and trying to keep up with friends in Gainesville. A mom, homeowner and holder of two jobs, she had been single for a year after ending a five-year relationship with the father of her 3-year-old son, D'Aundre.

Wilfork was in one of the University of Miami's computer labs, sitting near a fellow football player and peeking at what flashed on his teammate's screen.

"Hey, man. What was that?" he asked as images of young women appeared.

He found the site on the computer he was using and browsed through pictures, too. He was a defensive tackle, so everyone noticed his width, often overlooking that he stood 6' 2". He seemed to be focusing on the profile of an attractive light-skinned woman, nearly a foot shorter, who appeared to have Caribbean bloodlines. Seeking out women, online or elsewhere, was not usually his thing. While other guys chased girls, he was casting for other fish in the sea. Literally. His tall tales were about his 20-foot cast net and catching catfish and bluefish in Boynton Beach, his hometown, with his father and brother. As he sat before the computer, telling himself that he was only looking for a friend, he typed a line or two with his name and a buddy's number—he didn't own a cell phone—and pressed send.

He thought he was just sending an e-mail that night. What he eventually learned was that he had begun writing chapter one of what would become an odyssey: from South Florida to Vegas to New England, to the Patriots and one of the most successful love-business partnerships in all of professional sports. Along the way, some heartbeats would flutter and others would stop; some rings would be won and others would be exchanged; some dreams would appear to be dashed and others would live in the name on a little boy's birth certificate.

But before any of that happened, there was a phone call.

The first one was from Bianca to Vince on Aug. 14, 2001. After that, there were phone calls. At least once a day, and sometimes more. They wanted to be friends, but they soon discovered they didn't want to talk to anyone else. Her father, Angel, a former boxer in Cuba, was her best friend. His father, David, a former high-school football star in Florida, was his. She inherited Angel's determination. He inherited David's No. 75, worn out of admiration for Hall of Famers Deacon Jones and Mean Joe Greene.

The oldest of three children, Bianca was used to taking charge and making things happen. She had been cooking for her siblings since she was a little girl—she did that instead of play with dolls—so she knew what she was talking about when speaking of chicken and rice or smothered pork. Vince had worked at a catering company, where the boss gave him permission to go in the freezer, sift among the steak, shrimp and burgers, and cook anything he wanted. That combination meant he was well over the 275 pounds he claimed to be when they first began to talk. He didn't have any kids, but he heard her talk about her son so lovingly that it made him love him, too.

All of that, and they still hadn't met in person.

The conversation was good enough. August became September and September became early October. Vince had made a habit of calling her before meetings and sometimes after. He'd check in before bed and when he woke up. When he didn't think he'd be available to take her calls, he'd leave songs for her to listen to on his voicemail. One of his favorites was Ginuwine's "Differences," an irresistible melody paired with lyrics that reflected how he was beginning to feel: "I put you first now/You made me/helped mold me/Turned me into a man/I'm so responsible/And I owe it all to you."

They saw each other for the first time in mid-October, and the relationship continued to accelerate. It couldn't go too fast, though, because of D'Aundre. He still hadn't met Vince. When it happened, the kid, who had just turned 4 in September, stared down one of the biggest and baddest 300-plus-pound linemen in the state.

"What's up, li'l man?" Vince said.

"Wassup?" replied the boy, still not sure what to make of Vince's presence.

The hesitation lasted hours, if that long. The next few times they saw each other it was, "Where we goin' today, Vince?" Soon after, in December, Vince had moved off campus and into Bianca's house in Homestead. He told his father, to whom he told everything, and he thought it was cool. The person Vince didn't tell, out of fear, was his mother. He knew Barbara Wilfork, a 90-minute drive away in Boynton Beach, wouldn't be happy with the living arrangements nor the relationship itself. So he didn't tell his mom, which in turn annoyed his new girlfriend.

"Look, dude. This is ridiculous," she fumed one day. "You have two choices: Either you make your lies your truth or you make your truth your lies. If you tell your mama you stay on campus, go take your ass back to the dorms. Or you live here and, you know, be a man."

He nodded, but he didn't have the conversation. And then one day the cell phone Bianca bought for him rang. But Vince was in the shower, so his girlfriend answered.

"Who's this?" asked the surprised female voice on the other end of the line.

"This is Vince's girlfriend. Who's this?"

"This is Vincent's mom. Can I talk to him?"

Bianca happily walked into the bathroom and put the phone to Vince's ear.

While three-quarters of the Wilforks—Vince and his father and brother, both named David—didn't have an issue with Bianca, Barbara did. The men loved Bianca's food, her knowledge of sports, and her affinity for the soulful Luther Vandross. Barbara, though, had concerns. She didn't like that there was a "baby's daddy" who factored into the relationship, and she wasn't crazy about the age difference. Bianca assured her that her son's father wouldn't be a problem. She also pointed out that Vince had a 3.4 grade-point average while living with her, partly because she forced him to do his work so he could set an example for young D'Aundre.

Despite having the talent to play in the NFL, he was losing interest.

Things were better after the talk. Briefly. The new concerns were more serious. David Wilfork, who was dad to all of them, Bianca included, was not doing well. It was early 2002. The elder Wilfork was in his late 40s, but he had diabetes and walked with a cane. His engaging personality sometimes hid how he was feeling. Asked how he was doing, he was likely to say, "If I was any better I'd be perfect."

He was a man who caught, cut and cleaned fish with his boys; who taught his younger son, Vince, to love the number 75 and appreciate the techniques of the defensive line; a father and friend who had so much respect from his then-20-year-old son that the son once said, "Everything he said to me, I believed every bit of it. My daddy was everything. He'd tell me to run through a brick wall and I'm asking him how hard? Which one? How do you want me to do it?"

David Wilfork passed in June. Before he died, Vince slipped a University of Miami championship ring—won during Vince's freshman year—onto his finger.

"When I lost my father, everything stopped," Vince recalled recently. "I was devastated. It was kind of expected. He had been sick. When he told me he was dying, I kind of felt that it was time. It hurt me, but I kind of prepared. Still, I lost the best friend I had in life."

It was a sad time and an awkward one. Although Barbara obviously knew about Bianca, she hadn't met her in person. The first time she did, funeral arrangements were being made. Mr. Wilfork and Bianca had grown into friends in less than a year, just like Vince and Bianca.

"When it came time for Vince and his brother and his mom to go to the funeral home, they took me with them and I hated every second of it," Bianca said last month. "I was thinking, 'I shouldn't be here. It's private.' It was very uncomfortable. So for the first time in my life, I didn't say anything. I just sat there and listened."

She heard about insurance policies, wills, burial arrangements. And if it was already a difficult time to begin building something with Barbara, the news she had was going to complicate things further. On the same day Mr. Wilfork was buried, Bianca got back home and took a pregnancy test. Positive.

"Well, I'll help y'all with this one," Barbara said when she got the news, "but no more after that."

Something transformative was happening with Barbara and Vince. They always had similar personalities, so similar that they often found themselves going round and round in hopeless arguments. But when Vince lost his best friend, he discovered a new one in his mother. They'd talk, go to the grocery store together, discuss games, and bounce around baby names. In fact, Barbara was going to have the honor of naming the child Bianca was carrying.

Everything was put on hold in November 2002 when Barbara had a stroke. She was taken to Bethesda Memorial Hospital, the same hospital her husband was in earlier that year, in the same room.

"I'd walk in the room and look at her and it was like I was looking at my daddy all over again," Vince said. "Same hospital. Same room. Bethesda Memorial; I hate that place. I hate it to this day. I don't know why they did it that way. When I walked in there it was mama there, but I was seeing my daddy. It freaked me out."

By this time, with one national championship on his résumé, Vince was one of the best defensive linemen in the country. He was instinctive and smart, deceptively tall and fast. He was also heartbroken. Despite having the talent to play in the National Football League one day, he was losing interest. He was told that his mother was getting better and in line for a release from the hospital. And then she passed in mid-December.

Bianca suddenly understood why it hadn't been wrong for her to be in the funeral home with the Wilforks six months earlier. She took over the job of separating insurance policies and getting affairs in order for Barbara, who was so focused on arrangements for David that she hadn't planned for herself. Vince was 21. As he thought about where to go next in the new year, a baby girl arrived.

"When she was born, that outweighed everything," Vince said. "It took a lot of weight off our shoulders and we said, 'We have our own family now.' I think she basically overpowered everything. It went from 'Why this?' and 'Why that?' to moving forward."

They saw their baby girl, innocent, alert and healthy, and they were reminded of how all things, joyful and sad alike, had unfolded in their lives. They thought of the lives lost as well as their expanding young family. So they named the baby Destiny Barbara.

Marriage, at that point, was anticlimactic. They considered themselves married when they moved in together in late 2001. Still, one month before the 2004 NFL draft (3-3-04, which Bianca has tattooed on her fingers) they decided to get married in Vegas. Bianca interrupted a magical run at roulette, exchanged vows with the man she loved, and then returned to her hot table. It was such a bizarre trip that even the Patriots called during it and asked Vince if he wanted to take part in a predraft workout.

He chuckled. "I said, 'I'm in Vegas. Plus, y'all don't draft players from Miami, no way. No thanks."'

He went back to gambling, they returned to Miami with a profit, and a month later the Patriots drafted him. They were growing as a couple, too, learning to define their roles as husband and wife as well as mommy and daddy. They were so good at both that when Kennard McGuire first met them, he thought, "They're too good to be true."

McGuire, an agent who now represents Vince and about 30 other pro athletes, considers the Wilforks family. They vacation together every year, and his kids refer to the Wilforks as Aunt Bianca and Uncle Vince. All say they'd list each other on their emergency contact list.

Of all his clients, McGuire was asked, how many had wives and girlfriends as vocal as Bianca?

"None at all," he said with a laugh. "It's refreshing from the standpoint that she has awareness and knowledge. I encourage them to be involved." Bianca's involvement entails informing the agent (and team) what the couple would and would not like to see.

"Whenever I'd speak with Patriot management, I'd inform them that she would be taking part in the call as well," McGuire said. "The first time I told them, they said, 'Really?' I'll say that it was never speaking out of turn. Her style can be intimidating. The delivery is not the delivery you would expect on those types of calls."

So, in other words, she wasn't opposed to calling "bullshit" on executives? "I think that's the exact word," he agreed.

It was the Wilforks who encouraged McGuire to pursue his dreams, leave his old firm, and start his own agency. He did, and he's grateful for their advice. Of course, they would know about dreams. They tried for months to have a third child. Bianca experienced multiple miscarriages before she had a successful pregnancy. They were so thankful for the fulfillment of their wish that they named their son, now 14 months old, David Dream-Angel. It's a name that acknowledges fathers, best friends, family and possibility.

One night recently, young David was being bathed in the kitchen sink by Vince. The boy was tired, but there was a moment when his brown eyes found his father's. They both smiled and said nothing. It was just one reason of many why the initial click was worth it. ✖✖✖

A Moveable FEAST

IT'S LATE FALL. THE SUMMER TOURISTS HAVE VANISHED, THE AIR SNAPS WITH A TASTE OF FROST AND THE TREES ARE SHEDDING THEIR AUTUMN FINERY. This is the best of times in New England. Each of the following five road itineraries focuses on a different style of adventure—but all highlight the premier locations to fuel your particular obsession. You can delve into the wilds of northern Maine, or feed your locavorous appetite with the rich fare of northern Vermont. Drinkers will prefer the deep end of a brewery tour through the Green Mountains, while cognoscenti peer at the marvelous art collections in the Berkshires. And old salts, of course, can immerse themselves in the maritime history of Maine's rocky coast. Whatever your fancy, here are ways to make New England yours.

SOLO BISTRO

MARINER

IN A NUTSHELL: Not so long ago, the cove-dimpled shore of Maine's Midcoast region was the site of a great shipbuilding industry. Vessels from the town of Bath are still remembered and celebrated along this stunning stretch of tide-swept inlets.

STAY: Sleep in a historic Coast Guard lifesaving station right on the sandy shores of a six-mile-long beach at the Popham Beach Bed & Breakfast (4 RIVERVIEW AVE., POPHAM BEACH, PHIPPSBURG, MAINE, 207-389-2409, POPHAMBEACHBANDB.COM).

EAT: Solo Bistro (128 FRONT ST., BATH, MAINE, 207-443-3373, SOLOBISTRO.COM) is a fun, modern spot for delicacies like five-spice sea scallops and lobster risotto, and it has an impressive list of wines by the glass. Up the road in Brunswick, El Camino (15 CUSHING ST., BRUNSWICK, MAINE, 207-725-8228) serves surprisingly good Mexican fare with the odd New England touch, like Maine-crab enchiladas.

PLAY: Relive Bath's shipbuilding glory at the enormous Maine Maritime Museum (243 WASHINGTON ST., BATH, MAINE, 207-443-1316, MAINEMARITIMEMUSEUM.ORG), situated on the banks of the Kennebec River. Home to historic ships, an active waterfront and fascinating exhibits on everything from lobsters to six-masted schooners, you can max out your maritime mind. Then head south to Popham Beach State Park (14 MILES SOUTH OF BATH ON ROUTE 209, 207-389-1335) to relax in the wave-swept splendor of a pristine coastline.

OUTDOORS ENTHUSIAST

IN A NUTSHELL: The wilds of Maine offer mighty woods, waters and the idyllic natural backdrop for a lakeside sporting camp. Head north for superior hiking, snowshoeing and cross-country ski trails.

STAY: Medawisla Wilderness Lodge & Cabins (GREENVILLE, MAINE, 207-695-2690, 603-466-2727 RESERVATIONS, OUTDOORS.ORG) is nestled northeast of Moosehead Lake on the shores of Second Roach Pond, and provides both full-service dining and rustic, pet-friendly cabins that are far, far from the madding crowds (MEALS INCLUDED JANUARY–MARCH, SELF-SERVICE NOV. 1–20, CLOSED LATE NOVEMBER AND DECEMBER).

EAT: Auntie M's (13 LILY BAY ROAD, GREENVILLE, MAINE, 207-695-2238) dishes up breakfast goods to locals in a no-frills, real-deal atmosphere. The Rod-N-Reel Café (44 PRITHAM AVE., GREENVILLE, MAINE, 207-695-0388, RODNREELCAFE.COM) celebrates the region's piscine bounty and the anglers who live for it.

PLAY: A network of summer and winter trails radiate from Medawisla, providing extensive opportunities for hiking, snowshoeing, cross-country skiing and even a dog-sledding tour with a local guide. During the warmer months, add paddling and fly-fishing to the menu of outdoor adventure.

FOODIE

IN A NUTSHELL: The cornucopia of Vermont pours into the restaurant scene around Burlington, fusing into exceptional, locally-sourced cuisine. In-depth foodie knowledge stems from some of New England's best restaurants, resorts and university classrooms.

STAY: Pleasures of all sorts await visitors at Vermont's Culinary Resort & Spa (70 ESSEX WAY, ESSEX, VT., 802-878-1100, VTCULINARYRESORT.COM). In addition to luxury amenities and two fine-dining spots, the venue offers the Cook Academy, an onsite culinary education program.

EAT: The menu of the acclaimed Bluebird Tavern (317 RIVERSIDE AVE., BURLINGTON, VT., 802-540-1786, BLUEBIRDVERMONT.COM) rotates daily (and seasonally) to emphasize the freshest local produce.

PLAY: The Vermont Institute for Artisan Cheeses (255 CARRIGAN WING BUILDING, UNIVERSITY OF VERMONT, BURLINGTON, VT., 802-656-8300, NUTRITION.UVM.EDU/VIAC) offers a range of classes on all things cheese, including a one-day "sensory evaluation" lesson that teaches the techniques used by professional cheese tasters. The Burlington Farmers Market (CITY HALL PARK, BURLINGTON, VT., 802-310-5172, BURLINGTONFARMERSMARKET.ORG) purveys the region's bounty every Saturday until the end of October, continuing through the winter on the third Saturday of every month in Memorial Auditorium.

DRUNKARD

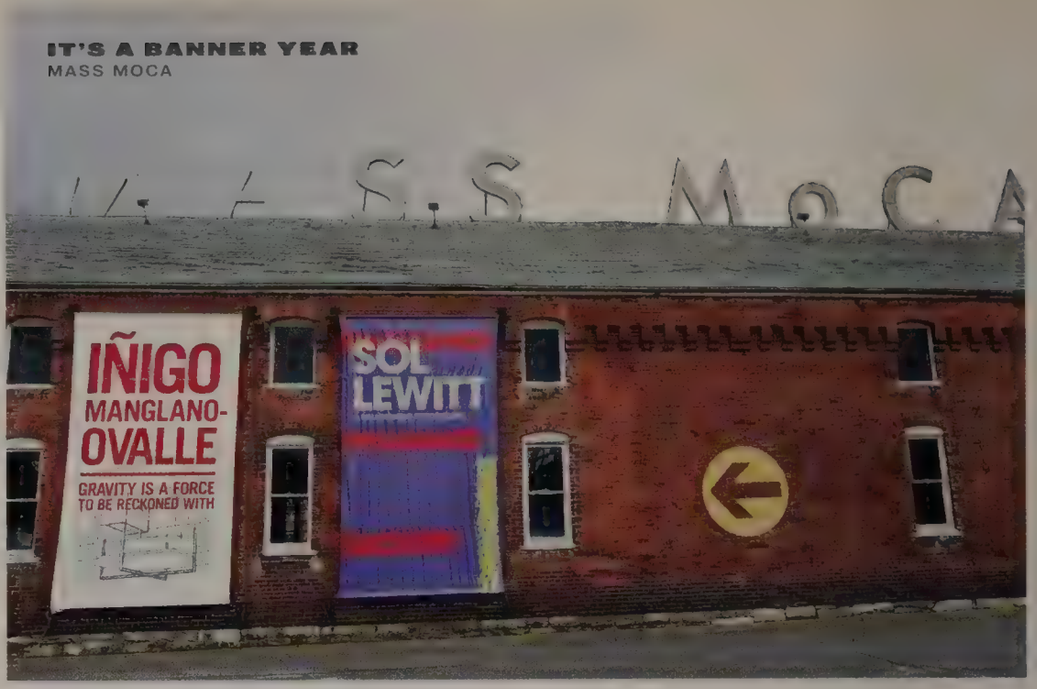
IN A NUTSHELL: Vermont boasts more than 20 breweries creating some of

New England's most delicious pints. Familiar names like Magic Hat, Long Trail and Harpoon give beer lovers a taste of the Green Mountain State.

STAY: Fullerton Inn & Restaurant (40 THE COMMON, CHESTER, VT., 802-875-2444, FULLERTONINN.COM) sits on the village green in this tranquil town, a perfect slice of New England that serves as home base—and tour guide (see below)—for exploring Vermont's breweries.

EAT: Warm up your palate on the way to Chester—and put some alcohol-sponging grub in your belly—at the Harpoon Brewery (336 RUTH CARNEY DRIVE, WINDSOR, VT., 888-427-7666, HARPOONBREWERY.COM), where you can savor beers and pub-style fare while overlooking the bottling line.

PLAY: Solve the "nobody-wants-to-be-the-driver-on-a-brewery-tour" dilemma with Fullerton Inn's one- to three-day brewery tours, which include a chauffeured visit to four different breweries a day.



ART LOVER

IN A NUTSHELL: In the shadow of Mount Greylock, classic Berkshire scenery and a profusion of exceptional art defines the cultural and culinary landscape of Williamstown and North Adams.

STAY: The Guesthouse at Field Farm (554 SLOAN ROAD, WILLIAMSTOWN, 413-458-3135, THETRUSTEES.ORG/FIELD-FARM) sits in the pastoral swales west of Mount Greylock on a sculpture-studded property owned by the Trustees of Reservations.

EAT: En route to the Guesthouse, Mezze Bistro and Bar (777 COLD SPRING ROAD (ROUTE 7), WILLIAMSTOWN, 413-458-0123, MEZZERESTAURANT.COM) dishes out contemporary American cuisine—with ingredients sourced from the surrounding farms—in a 19th-century building on three bucolic acres.

PLAY: The museums in this area boast some of the best collections in New England, including an exceptional selection of French Impressionist paintings at the Clark Art Museum (225 SOUTH STREET, WILLIAMSTOWN, 413-458-2303, CLARKART.EDU). Modern works get their due at the Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (1040 MASS MOCA WAY, NORTH ADAMS, 413-662-2111, MASSMOCA.ORG), while the Williams College Museum of Art (15 LAWRENCE HALL DRIVE, SUITE 2, WILLIAMSTOWN, 413-597-2429, WCMA.ORG) has an enviable stock of American paintings. ✖✖✖

In the Blood

The Strangling Bros. Ladies and gentlemen, welcome to the grisliest show on Earth, but be warned: Things could get messy under the big top. ImprovBoston's GoreFest VIII: Cirque du Slaughté, Oct. 21–31, tells the bloody tale of members of a doomed Depression-era circus as they struggle against the forces of evil. Yet murder is just part of the fun in this campy romp into mayhem. Armed with song and dance and gallons of red corn syrup, the ringmaster, magician and conjoined bearded ladies slash their way through a show that will leave audiences shocked, splattered and screaming with laughter. Johanna Kaiser

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Capsules by Sean Burns

The American ★★★ ½ A triumph of form over content, director Anton Corbijn's curiously affecting mood piece follows George Clooney's haunted, aging assassin as he hides out in the Italian mountains of Abruzzo. Synced to a different time signature than most contemporary thrillers, The American comprises long silent spells and existential dread. Cinematographer Martin Ruhe paints a lush canvas of verdant riverbanks and dim, foreboding nighttime streets. The anxiety in the stillness gets under your skin. Clooney isn't just getting more annoyingly handsome as the years go on; the sonofabitch is also becoming a better actor—simultaneously bolder and more restrained. The American calls to mind his heartbroken astronaut in Steven Soderbergh's underrated Solaris remake. Showing no trace of his gregarious movie-star persona, Clooney is gaunt and haunted. Often banished to the far corner of the widescreen frame, he methodically scans the surroundings for threats, never at rest. Playing a man with no past and no future, he lives only in the precarious present. Corbijn's impeccably controlled filmmaking hammers home the loneliness of this condition. (In the suburbs.)

Catfish ★★ What to make of Catfish? A Sundance sensation that purports to be a stranger-than-fiction true story, the movie doesn't ever feel like it's playing on the level. Is this all some sort of Borat-style performance piece? And if so, why isn't it more interesting? (I must tread lightly here to avoid spoilers.) An annoyingly overemotive young man named Nev Schulman works as a freelance photographer in New York City. One day, he's contacted by eight-year-old Abby Pierce, an art prodigy living in Michigan who enjoys painting portraits of his photos. Nev becomes a mentor to Abby, then, via Facebook, finds himself smitten with her entire family. We're supposed to buy Nev falling head over heels for Abby's 19-year-old virgin half-sister, sight unseen, but most of Catfish feels fake, as if Schulman and his coconspirators stumbled into a wild story and retroactively shot additional bogus footage to make themselves look like suckers for the first hour. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Dinner for Schmucks ★★ Have wacky hair and false teeth ever made a performer more amusing? Or are they just the affectations of performers trying way too hard? Paul Rudd stars as an up-and-coming financial analyst who, after impressing his haughty boss, is invited to a special dinner party with the executive class. The only catch is he's required to bring an idiot that all these rich jerks can mock during the meal. Initially repulsed, the opportunistic Rudd suddenly sees a promotion in his future after accidentally hitting Steve Carell's loudmouth grotesque with his car. Every performance is hideously overscaled in this film, and director Jay Roach's unfortunate tendency to keep the camera within six inches of their faces underlines the strain. There's a pleading quality to Dinner for Schmucks that's the antithesis of funny, as watching talented people ham it up in pore-exposing close-ups inspires more pity than giggles. Why is Roach so hell-bent on turning such talented actors into prop comics? (In the suburbs.)

Easy A ★★★ With her barbed line readings and world-weary precociousness, Emma Stone has the poise and charm of a less tragic Lindsay Lohan. Stone runs away with this tart teenage riff on Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter. She plays a good girl pretending to go bad in order to enhance her social standing at a prim and proper high school that's lorded over by judgmental Christian kids. It's a welcome skewering of the promise-ring culture, with a game Amanda Bynes providing some gut-busting laughs as a messianic proto-church lady, and two sublime supporting turns from Patricia Clarkson and Stanley Tucci as Stone's hippie parents. Lisa Kudrow and Thomas Haden Church costar as faculty members boasting some suspicious extracurricular activities, while director Will Gluck is able to slip in satirical jabs without going over the top into message-mongering. The busy visual scheme is a bit much, as are the ubiquitous John Hughes references, but Easy A's a breezy lark announcing the arrival of a major star. It isn't quite Clueless, but it'll do. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Get Low ★★ Robert Duvall has made a career out of sounding the depths of that cuddly, incorrigible heart of darkness lurking just beneath the Mason-Dixon Line, and Get Low director Aaron Schneider trades on this shamelessly. The former Boo Radley stars as a Depression-era boogeyman who returns after 40 years in the

SENIORITY RULES

Unfortunately a stellar cast can't float a subpar story.

Red ★★½
Starring Bruce Willis, Morgan Freeman, Mary-Louise Parker, Helen Mirren and Brian Cox. Based on the comic book by Warren Ellis and Cully Hamner. Screenplay by Jon and Erich Hoeber. Directed by Robert Schwentke. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

YOU CAN'T GO WRONG WITH the sight of Dame Helen Mirren firing a heavy machine gun, but Robert Schwentke's Red certainly comes close.

A terrific concept that barely survives a botched execution, this overscaled adaptation of Warren Ellis' DC comic stars Bruce Willis as a retired CIA agent having a terrible time adjusting to his quiet life in the suburbs. A former black-ops specialist used to toppling governments, Willis' Frank Moses is now flummoxed by simple, day-to-day tasks, like figuring out when he should put up the Christmas decorations. Lonely Frank finds himself so smitten with a telephone operator at the government pension department (Mary-Louise Parker) that he rips up his monthly checks just so he can call her to discuss cheesy romance novels.

Red's early scenes have a disarming lightness, initially suggesting an armed and dangerous About Schmidt. Willis appears more alert onscreen than he's been in years, striking up a playful chemistry with Parker's loopy cubicle drone. But then one night, a S.W.A.T. team shows up and levels Frank's suburban abode.

The title, we learn, is Agency code for Retired: Extremely Dangerous. It seems there's a nasty bit of unfinished business from a job gone wrong back in the 1980s. Frank's old team has been marked for elimination by the new regime, so he's got to hit the retirement homes and round up his old partners in skullduggery, staying one step ahead of these damn kids who think they're badass secret agents.

It's an irresistible idea, particularly for fans of the "Get Off My Lawn" genre, best epitomized by The Expendables or anything starring Clint Eastwood. Red fills out the ranks with a killer cast, perhaps the most overqualified we've ever seen in a movie so primarily concerned with blowing stuff up. Morgan Freeman is all sly smiles as Willis' former partner, ogling the nurses at the old-age home while grousing about the liver cancer that doesn't seem to be slowing him down very much. John Malkovich brings the crazy as a paranoid casualty of the CIA's LSD experiments. As far as over-the-top Malkovich performances go, this one is better judged than, say, Jonah Hex, as he varies the kooky tics and even deadpans now and again, always staying one degree shy of annoying.

It's an irresistible idea, particularly for fans of the "Get Off My Lawn" genre.

Best in show are Helen Mirren and Brian Cox. Once the most ruthless wet-work asset MI6 ever trained, she's now trying to act like Martha Stewart in a lavish McMansion, taking the occasional freelance hit to break up the monotony. He's the Russian spy who never got over their secret Cold War affair, wandering through the movie with a giddy, love-struck grin, still convinced that when she shot him in the chest years back it was a sign of affection, because otherwise she would've aimed for his head.

There's even a cameo by Ernest Borgnine, wearing a giant goofy smile and clearly overjoyed to still be in the pictures.

So far, so great. But the problem is that the story never develops into something worthy of these characters. A boilerplate conspiracy theory serves primarily to shuffle everybody from one exploding set-piece to another, and there's a genuinely wretched performance by Richard Dreyfuss as a sniveling arms manufacturer. With the exception of Dreyfuss, the cast deftly downplays the silliness, yet Schwentke overindulges the tale's comic-book origins. The movie suffers from way too many cartoony, CGI-enhanced shootouts, physics-defying camera swoops and awful scene transitions that transform into postcards. You can actually watch Willis lose interest as the film wears on, abandoning his character's quirks and settling back into his routine, gun-toting stoicism.

There's a great movie to be made with this cast and concept, but Red isn't it. Willis' promising romance with Parker ("I thought you'd have hair," she quips) gets back-burnered into tired damsel-in-distress tropes. Some ripe political satire is sniffed at, only to be discarded. Meanwhile, Mirren and Cox merrily jaunt along as if starring in a much funnier film of their own. I'd love to see their spin-off.

On one hand, it's impossible not to enjoy watching this gang of old pros having a laugh in ridiculous genre territory, but the low-key character comedy ends up buried beneath all the pyrotechnics. If the filmmakers had more faith in their cast (and their audience, for that matter), Red could've been something very special. ✖✖✖ woods with a giant wad of rumpled "hermit-money," determined to stage his own funeral. The only catch is that he wants to be around for the proceedings. Thank God then for Bill Murray, wryly playing a transplanted Chicago mortician with a penchant for top-coats and a tendency toward drink. The characterization in the movie is what works, with odd details that inform their backgrounds. But Schneider seems to see it otherwise, ramping up the melodrama for a shocking revelation that is neither shocking nor revelatory. Overdirecting in an amateur fashion, he hard-sells a quaint story to the point where a humble little movie feels like it's constantly puffing out its chest. (In the suburbs.)

The Girl Who Played With Fire ★★ This spring's surprise art-house smash The Girl With the Dragon Tattoo didn't do much for me, but I can understand its appeal. Based on the first book of Swede Stieg Larsson's best-selling trilogy, the film spiced up hoary CBS procedural tropes with dashes of tawdry transgression and chic exoticism. It was like an episode of Cold Case, but with subtitles, facial piercings and rape. The Girl Who Played With Fire, alas, is one of those sad sequels that removes everything anyone might've enjoyed in the original. Noomi Rapace's iconic damaged hacker Lisbeth Salander is framed for murder, and only her beloved, beleaguered journalist Mikael Blomkvist believes she's innocent. Cripplingly, the film commits the Jewel of the Nile sequel sin of keeping the two characters we came to see apart for the entire running time. Meager as Dragon Tattoo's pleasures were, the two leads worked well together. This time, not a single word is exchanged between them. Occasional e-mails just don't cut it, chemistry-wise. (At West Newton and in the suburbs.)

Inception ★★★ ½ Ever since his art-house smash Memento, writer/director Christopher Nolan has been obsessed with smashing up the syntax of conventional thrillers. Inception is the kind of pet project that could only happen in the wake of The Dark Knight, as Nolan scored a couple hundred million dollars by helming one of the biggest blockbusters of all time. Inception is an expansive, expensive brain-bender rooted in genre satisfactions; half Solaris, half The Matrix. Leonardo DiCaprio stars as a sullen corporate espionage agent slinking around Kyoto stealing valuable information by infiltrating people's dreams. Cleverly layered, the movie jumbles four separate realities into continuous sequences, as action scenes happen simultaneously across different dimensions but with the same characters. It's a huge movie full of meaty ideas, even when the backbreaking ambition begins to feel like a grind. (At Aquarium, Waltham Embassy and in the suburbs.)

Inside Job ★★★ ½ Documentarian Charles Ferguson—who helmed the extraordinary Iraq documentary No End in Sight—turns his attention to the 2008 economic meltdown. The results are harrowing, infuriating and laced with a surprising strain of gallows humor. Narrated by Matt Damon, Inside Job provides an invaluable guide to credit default swaps and collateralized debt obligations, making Wall Street jargon accessible to even a numerically challenged lunkhead like yours truly. It's hard not to get your ire up watching these exorbitantly compensated robber barons fleecing pension funds with falsely rated junk investments. Ferguson has a gift for clarity, explaining derivatives in ways that flummoxed Michael Moore in last year's dismal Capitalism: A Love Story. Cathartic but less successful is a sequence in which the filmmaker questions a few econ wizards. It's fun to watch them squirm but feels cheap in comparison to the rest of the picture's razor-sharp outrage and simplicity. Everybody who's in some money trouble should see this film. So I guess that means just about everybody should see this film. (At Kendall Square.)

The Kids Are All Right ★★★ ½ Simply delightful. Director/cowriter Lisa Cholodenko's family farce stars Annette Bening and Julianne Moore as lesbian helicopter moms flummoxed by their kids' latching on to their hapless, sperm donor dad. Played with no shortage of comic brilliance by Mark Ruffalo, he's a bare-chested, groovy organic farmer with a hankering for instant gratification and a penchant for phrases like, "Right on." Complications ensue. Gently ribbing certain Whole Foods lifestyle choices that'll be familiar to anybody from California or Cambridge, The Kids Are All Right has a warm, randy spirit, which embraces these characters not in spite of, but because of their imperfections. Moore, in particular, hasn't been allowed to cut loose like this in eons. She's a lost New Age girl trying to get her groove back, while Bening's tightly wound wine aficionado scores all the haymaker put-downs. Cholodenko's last film was 2002's wonderful Laurel Canyon, and Kids hits the same raunchy comedic heights. In Cholodenko's world, middle age is a funny and sexy place to be. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Let Me In ★★ ½ Don't tell Stephenie Meyer, but sometimes vampire lovin' isn't so romantic. Matt Reeves instantaneous, entirely superfluous remake of Tomas Alfredson's 2008 art-house hit, Let the Right One In, takes a dim view of interspecies swooning, as Kodi Smit-McPhee's bullied child falls under the spell of Chloe Grace Moretz's undead girl-next-door. Adopting Alfredson's stark, wintry compositions (sometimes frame for frame) while staying loyal to the muted latchkey-kid malaise, the Cloverfield director comes up with a dutiful exercise in movie karaoke. Too bad the film has no reason to exist. Besides slimming down the supporting cast and tinkering a tiny bit with the third act, Let Me In has nothing to offer that wasn't already available in its superior Swedish incarnation. Moretz is a scant bit more accessible than her animalistic predecessor, but otherwise this is secondhand material with no personality of its own. It's an awful lot of trouble to go through just because some people don't like subtitles. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Machete ★★ Based on a two-and-a-half minute trailer Robert Rodriguez shot for the 2007 mega-bomb Grindhouse, Machete stars B-movie icon Danny Trejo as a monosyllabic Mexican Shaft, sending up blaxploitation tropes with a Mexi-Cali accent. Like most Rodriguez movies, this one was shot on the cheap in Austin and contains enough wit and invention to entertain the audience for 15 minutes. Too bad about that last hour and a half. Robert De Niro embarrasses himself trying to send up a certain Arizona sena-

Deep-Blue Sea

Coast Call Often comforting and occasionally chilling, the ocean serves as canvas for Rebecca Meyers' Blue Mantle. The 2010 James and Audrey Foster Prize finalist premieres her latest film among a selection of short works on Oct. 28 at the ICA. Meyers delves into the antiquity of local coastlines and explores the various connections between the vitality of our urban backdrop and the ebb and flow of the Atlantic.

Matt Nannis

tor, but finds himself outclassed by a couple of startlingly game performances from Don Johnson (as a redneck militia madman) and Steven Seagal (as a crime lord wondering how he didn't get at least a cameo in The Expendables). Meanwhile, Lindsay Lohan gets naked, Jessica Alba is saddled with some ill-advised political speeches and all of Rodriguez's low-rent gore-hound fantasias never quite congeal into actual scenes. He should just make trailers. (In the suburbs.)

The Other Guys ★★★ Every bit the movie Kevin Smith's Cop Out desperately wanted to be, Will Ferrell's fourth collaboration with his Anchorman director Adam McKay is another take on the oft-parodied milieu of 1980s mismatched buddy pictures. Except unlike Cop Out, this film has actual laughs. Ferrell tones it down and actually acts for a change, playing a forensic accountant stranded on desk duty. Supercops Samuel L. Jackson and Dwayne Johnson get all the glory, destroying entire city blocks chasing down pot dealers, while Ferrell and his frustrated partner, Mark Wahlberg, chase down a much more insidious band of Wall Street swindlers. Even at his most restrained, Ferrell's mugging can grow tiresome. Good thing Wahlberg plays all this nonsense totally straight. He takes the role so seriously, you'd think he was up for another Academy Award. Marky Mark huffs and puffs as if nobody told him he was in a comedy. His reaction shots are better than any of the jokes. Nobody plays exasperation better. (In the suburbs.)

The Social Network ★★★★ You might be put off by the prospect of a movie about Facebook, but remember that Citizen Kane wasn't really about the newspaper industry. Like that classic, The Social Network uses a media magnate as an entry point to a story more concerned with loneliness and megalomania. It plays like gangbusters. The unlikely pairing of heart-on-his-sleeve, West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin and clinically dyspeptic, Fight Club director David Fincher is unexpectedly revelatory. Zipping back and forth in time from dorms to deposition rooms, the movie isn't so concerned with legal questions of authorship as it is with class differences and the concept of a level playing field in our tech-savvy era. The last shot is a doozy, though. Sorkin and Fincher might as well be saying: "I'm sorry, Mr. Kane, but Rosebud has still not accepted your friend request." (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Takers ★ Making a brief pit stop in the theaters on its way to Redbox kiosks, this comically derivative cops-and-robbers tale is a vanity project for producers/stars/felons Chris Brown and Tip "T.I." Harris. The wannabe music moguls cast themselves in a blatant knockoff of Michael Mann's Heat, borrowing the sleek suits and epic shoot-outs like a couple of little boys playing dress-up. The ridiculously overqualified Idris Elba (best known as Stringer Bell from HBO's The Wire) stars as the cool, calculating leader of a heist crew angling for one last score before retirement. Matt Dillon plays a cop-on-the-edge, and perhaps the only L.A.P.D. detective allowed to walk around the office in his undershirt. T.I.'s rogue ex-con gets out of jail with a "foolproof" armored car job, and everybody strikes dramatic poses against the glossy cinematography. Lacking a single original moment, the movie regurgitates massive chunks of True Romance and Mann's oeuvre. But Takers does manage to answer one question: How can you make Hayden Christensen even more annoying? Put him in a hipster fedora. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Tamara Drewe ★★ Based on a Posy Simmonds' comic strip that appeared in The Guardian, which itself was a reworking of Thomas Hardy's Far From the Madding Crowd, the latest from prolific director Stephen Frears is an English country pastoral rife with raunchy humor and literary in-jokes. At a writers' retreat run by a chronic philanderer (Christopher Hitchens look-alike Roger Allam) and his long-suffering wife (Tamsin Greig), the return of the title character (Gemma Arterton) sets the idyll village atwitter, as she's blossomed into a knockout and benefited quite nicely from a nose job. The strapping farmhand next door (dull Luke Evans) has always had eyes for Tamara, but, alas, the games of musical beds being played in this town require a scorecard. Frears is aiming for a retro, earthy, sexy romp, but this cast lacks the charisma to pull it off, and the moldy old punchlines could use some polish. Despite all the men clamoring over our heroine, Arterton remains an attractive cipher. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

The Tillman Story ★★★ Pat Tillman turned down a multimillion-dollar NFL contract to enlist in the army and serve his country. His sacrifice was rewarded with distortion, demagoguery and a chain of lies snaking up through the top levels of command. Killed by friendly fire in an accident the Bush administration sold as an act of valor, Tillman became an easy symbol for a government trying to foist an unpopular war on a weary public. But Tillman's loved ones wouldn't stand for that. Amir Bar-Lev's rousing, sometimes shocking documentary follows the Tillman family as they struggle through mountains of red tape and bureaucratic doublespeak to knock down the military's manufactured narratives in search of the truth. This is an angry film, but righteously so. The complex and brooding Tillman was used as a poster boy for a cause he'd lost faith in, and this documentary feels true to his restless, questioning spirit. (In the suburbs.)

The Town ★★ The kind of movie about Charlestown that only somebody from Cambridge could make, writer/director Ben Affleck's latest symptom of townie street-cred envy is chockablock with dropped R's, Celtic tattoos and preposterous gangster movie clichés. Casting himself as the kindest, most-sensitive bank robber a gal could ever want, Affleck models a stunning number of local sports insignias and offers close-ups of his sculpted physique doing pull-ups. Adapted from Chuck Hogan's novel Prince of Thieves, The Town lurches from one dead-end plot thread to the next, piling increasingly absurd action sequences atop mawkish arias of self-pity. Mad Men's Jon Hamm trails two steps behind the gang as a distractingly scruffy FBI agent. Only The Hurt Locker's Jeremy Renner, channeling Jimmy Cagney by way of the projects, makes an impression, but even he gets short shrift in Affleck's maudlin climax that's half–Shawshank Redemption, half-naked narcissism. The final shot is the most unintentionally hilarious thing I've seen in ages. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Toy Story 3 ★★★★ So this year's summer blockbuster for adults turns out to be a contemplation of mortality and obsolescence starring a bunch of animated plastic toys. You might reasonably wonder if we critics ever get bored writing love letters to Pixar, especially when it comes to a long-delayed sequel that on the surface appears to be geared toward audience familiarity and 3-D price-gouging gimmicks. Yet these sons of bitches have done it again. Tom Hanks' cowboy Woody and Tim Allen's career-redeeming Buzz Lightyear find themselves put out to pasture once young Andy heads off to college. They're confined to a shabby daycare center that carries eerie echoes of senior-citizen homes across the land. What follows is a rousing jailbreak adventure with a tragic undertow, tackling serious questions of death and abandonment in a mature manner that would make Ingmar Bergman proud, if only he'd played with dolls. This is a treasure. (In the suburbs.)

Waiting for "Superman" ★★★ An Inconvenient Truth director Davis Guggenheim really wants to depress you. As if chronicling the impending end of the world wasn't enough, Guggenheim now sets his sights on our country's troubled public-school system with predictably dire conclusions. Slapping a giant "kick me" sign on the back of powerful teachers' unions, Waiting for "Superman" follows a handful of promising inner-city kids hoping to make the lottery for their local, thriving charter schools. I won't pretend that I'm knowledgeable enough on the subject to gauge the veracity of Guggenheim's blanket assertions, and I'm fully willing to admit that he's overlooking larger issues like systemic poverty and obvious societal inequities. But all that said, the film remains a deeply moving experience. How does your heart not break while watching the fates of children surrendered to a random drawing? (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

You Will Meet a Tall Dark Stranger ★ ½ Another of Woody Allen's annual exercises limps into theaters, full of moneyed infidelity, old jazz standards and rote pessimism. It's tempting to just cut-and-paste from my previous reviews of Allen's late-career output, as that seems to be how he writes his screenplays these days. A recycled recitation of the filmmaker's pet themes, You Will Meet a Tall Dark Stranger has all the verve of a contractual obligation. Anthony Hopkins (himself no stranger to half-assing his way through movies) stars as a rich London lout who, spooked by contemplations of mortality, starts going to tanning salons. He quickly takes up with a gold-digging prostitute half his age, leaving his wife to seek the solace of a fortune teller. Meanwhile Naomi Watts and Josh Brolin go through some marital woes of their own, leading to familiar Woody rants about the meaninglessness of life in a godless existence. At least he used to throw in some jokes. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

CANYON ECHOES

Dawes recharges country-folk traditions with soul-searching rock.

Dawes plays Royale on Nov. 6.

Matt Jacoby

SINGER/SONGWRITER Taylor Goldsmith fronts L.A. folk-rockers Dawes with missionary zeal. But when the band heads for the next town, he prefers a backseat in the van—with heavy-duty ear muffs.

"That's one of my favorite reasons to go on the road," Goldsmith says. "If anyone's listening to music or talking in the front, I have six to eight hours of reading time."

His recent literary diet includes F. Scott Fitzgerald, Dostoevsky and Che Guevara, and he'll even lift the occasional quote. "Every man ends up with the face that he deserves," in his song "When You Call My Name," comes from George Orwell. "I don't feel weird taking it from a different art form," Goldsmith says. "That can add a different dimension."

Dawes has entered another dimension since the group released its 2009 debut North

Hills on Dave Matthews' ATO label, earning stacks of glowing press to fuel those long van rides.

But Goldsmith, 25, and his brother/drummer Griffin, 19, grew up around music. Their father, Lenny, who joined Dawes for a song at this year's Newport Folk Festival, served as lead singer for the funk group Tower of Power. And the boys named their band after grandfather Dawes Lafayette Goldsmith, a fiddle-playing country fan who tried to turn them on to Hank Williams and Bob Wills.

"Later on, once he passed, all that music became big influences of ours," says Goldsmith, a former post-punk devotee. "Because we didn't get to really share that with him at the time, [the name Dawes] was sort of our way of including him."

As much as family influences, Goldsmith credits the California-centric sounds of the Flying Burrito Brothers, Jackson Browne, Joni Mitchell and the Grateful Dead for direction. The Goldsmith brothers, bassist Wylie Gerber and former pianist Tay Strathairn also drew inspiration from North Hills producer Jonathan Wilson, who invited the fledgling quartet to his Laurel Canyon studio for jams with such notables as Conor Oberst and the Black Crowes' Chris Robinson.

"They were just friends and admirers of his who wanted to be around him and the environment that he cultivated," Goldsmith says. "We were taken to school by those guys in a healthy, positive way. We appreciate that time there because it helped us realize what it takes to be a really good professional player."

Dawes keeps its feet in L.A. while nodding to the South.

Dawes sounds assured if measured on North Hills, an album that grows on a listener over time, suggesting a California version of the Band. "We were a band that hadn't gone on tour," Goldsmith says, "and the record sounds like that."

Things have changed as Dawes heads for Royale on Nov. 6. Goldsmith bites into more electric-guitar solos onstage, and he promises more energy on a follow-up CD just completed with new pianist Alex Casnoff. Dawes spent more time on the album, which includes organ from Benmont Tench, a member of Tom Petty's Heartbreakers who frequented Wilson's jams.

Like that Florida-born group, Dawes keeps its feet in L.A. while nodding to the South, from the airy bluegrass-gospel harmonies of "Give Me Time" to Goldsmith's lyrics, which reference Alabama and Carolina as well as California. Even when he sings, "I followed her here to Birmingham, where the soil is so much richer" in "That Western Skyline," he embraces autobiography.

"She's very real," Goldsmith says from his L.A. home. "A city boy goes to Alabama and goes back home with his tail between his legs… not really having an understanding of what that world means."

In turn, many of Goldsmith's songs evoke prayers or even parables, an element some people have mined for Christian intent. "I don't correct them or anything, but at the same time, a lot of these songs are extensions of my own confusions or questions with that sort of thing, my own relationship with faith," he says. "It's definitely not coming from a place of a guy who has anything figured out or any religion he's committed himself to."

He's clearly committed to the music, both with Dawes and Middle Brother, a side group with kindred singers/songwriters John McCauley of Deer Tick and Matt Vasquez of Delta Spirit that should be releasing its own CD this spring. Goldsmith says Dawes, Deer Tick and Delta Spirit may even tour together to accommodate that collaboration. Talk about a dream combination for fans of the new Americana. ✖✖✖

Better Red

Machine Age

Combining pop, soul and rock, British sensation Florence and the Machine took the U.K. by storm. Now singer Florence Welch (and, to a lesser extent, her changing backup) is rising to stardom in the U.S. with "Dog Days Are Over" from the Eat, Pray, Love soundtrack, while her performance at the 2010 MTV Video Music Awards cemented her reputation for dark, romantic pop hits. Hear her quirky tunes on Oct. 31 at the House of Blues.

Aris and Richard Snyder went to Santorini, Greece, known for its steep cliffs, narrow, cobblestone streets and world famous hospital for ankle injuries.

Aptly named "Wall Street Journal" columnist John Fund invested some time in checking out our "Luxe Life" issue, where he stocked up on style tips.

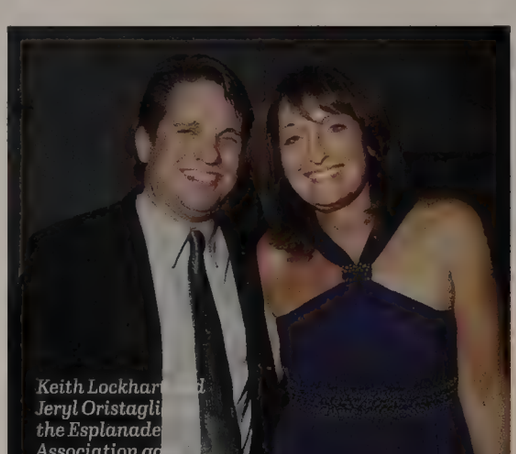
RIVER DANCE

Pass the Ripple

Most 100-year-olds could use a little work, if not an outright facelift, which is why the Esplanade Association celebrated the park's centennial with a gala dinner-dance that did justice to the beautiful setting, underneath a sumptuously decorated tent on the banks of the Charles.

The evening's honoree was pops maestro Keith Lockhart, squiring his stunning spouse, Emiley, who glad-handed with such nabobs as BSO head honcho Mark Volpe and the perfectly lovely Martha, tech mogul Jord Poster, the elusive Rich Levitan, sailor and sportsman George Parkman Denny, Beacon Hellion Joan Jolley, T-shirt and Frisbee gajillionaire John Jacobs, the sparkling Carla Cabot, investment guru Peter Monaco and the fabulous Sarah, banking behemoth Chad Gifford, babe-a-licious blonde Kathy Burns and her handsome husband, Michael Greeley, and one woman who said, "I'm here with my gay husband," to which he added, "And I left mine at home!"

> "I never thought I'd turn out to be one of those people you saw drinking in the park."



As bidding in the live auction got underway, the auctioneer prompted the crowd by saying, "It's just money. It's paper. It gets in the way!" This prompted one guest to say, "There's nothing more entertaining than watching rich people bid $20,000 on something they don't really need."

However, the evening's most amusing remark came from the man who said, "I never thought I'd turn out to be one of those people you saw drinking in the park."

The Closet Door's Ajar

How many handsome men can you fit into the ballroom of the Four Seasons?

Ask the people at the Point Foundation, a scholarship fund for LGBT youth, whose annual fund-raiser attracted the likes of board member Michael Poirier, Boston

Keith Lockhart and Jeryl Oristaglio at the Esplanade Association gala

Frances Rivera and Jared Bowen at the Esplanade Association gala

Joel Nolan, John Koss and Gregory Sawicki at the Point Foundation fund-raiser

Michel Poirier at the Point Foundation fund-raiser

Macy Gray at the Mass Equality fund-raiser

Spirit publisher David Zimmerman, dashing equestrian Paul Butterworth, eternal party boy Bill Emery, attorney-at-large Mark Young banking hottie Wendell K. Chestnut, the improbably tall John Koss, and one person who introduced a friend as "the eyes, ears, nose and throat of Boston... but mostly the throat."

Meanwhile, when another guest was told that one of the speakers was going to be Katherine Miller, the West Point cadet who transferred to Yale because of the military's policy on lesbians, he exclaimed, "Oh, honey—if you don't ask I won't tell!"

Jeepers Creepers

I hope Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie never get married if it means more nights like the fund-raiser for MassEquality—an intimate evening with Macy Gray at the Wilbur Theatre, followed by an after-party at the W Hotel.

The concert attracted the likes of aristocratic literary agent Esmond Harmsworth, the amazingly undead Joshua Janson and his adorable husband, Ben McGuire, Kiss 108 heartthrob Jim Clerkin, the aptly named Woody Woodworth, ink-stained cutie Scott Kearnan, Hostess snack cake Brett Casiraghi and hordes of equally entertaining others.

The pop star performed a 90-minute set that included a Radiohead cover and soon-to-be hits from her new album, and went through at least four costume changes that ranged from a giraffe-print, Bea Arthur caftan with Muppet-fur sleeves to a Diana-Ross-meets-Janis-Joplin ballgown.

Meanwhile, one admiring fan said, "I've never seen false eyelashes you could rake a yard with.

Monthly Contest

Opening Night at the Boston Symphony Orchestra always attracts a well-dressed crowd, but this year it included a white-hot Boston designer whose purse contained the following: a needle and a spool of black thread, Life Savors, a wallet, lip gloss and a cellphone. The first reader who can correctly identify the fashionista in question will receive an Improper Bostonian T-shirt, which never goes out of style. ×××

What's the Matter With Matter?

When strangers ask me where I stand in the old Stoicism versus Epicureanism debate, I always say, "Get away from me, you weird, pretentious vagrant!" But it's a valid question, since one classical philosophy believes that the universe has a guiding wisdom, and the other says we're just the sum of our molecules. So if human beings are simply clouds of congealed, drippy matter oozing through space, texting and drinking Dr Pepper to pass the time, then we might as well try to enjoy ourselves before we dissolve.

A sunset the color of seraphs' wings, the love in the eyes of an adored child, the call of the loons on a crystal morning in June… bah. This issue is about material pleasures. Stuff that can be measured less by its impact on your soul than on your credit rating. And while the philosopher Epicurus believed that true pleasure could only be achieved through virtue and asceticism, he never owned a plasma TV the size of an elephant's backside.

It's a fair point, though, that not everyone has the same idea of the good life. In this issue, you can read about a popular chef's favorite shoes and a party planner's vision of earthly delights. My own would earn me a staunch caning in certain parts of the world, but I guess this just illustrates the classroom dictum that, despite the fact we're all just a bunch of drippy matter, everyone's special.

BIG SPENDING

WHAT PRICE LUXURY? If you measure by the standard of the Four Seasons' presidential suite, the answer is $8,000 per night. In addition to the expected 3,000 square feet of plush living space, batteries of plasma TVs, full kitchen and 10-seat dining room, it comes with a private balcony overlooking the Public Garden. But the platinum-coated icing on the cake is a baby grand piano that John Williams used to compose seven different film scores.

THE LIST

Kevin Garnett will make $18.8 million this season. Or, to put it another way, he could buy:

57,317 Dugout box seats at Fenway

2,350 Nights in the Mandarin Oriental Boston's Dynasty Suite

1,475 Engagement martinis at the Oak Bar

250 Baume & Mercier Flying Tourbillion watches

76 Porsche 911 GT2 RS's

A far cry from the gluey, curdled version offered up at most Chinese restaurants, Shangri-La's homestyle egg-drop soup is made of clear, full-bodied broth, brimming with cellophane noodles, wilted greens and shiitakes. Crowning the feast (it's big enough for two) is an airy, lightly browned omelet that a grandmotherly server cuts and scoops into a bowl for you tableside.

Going Out

Fellow Citizen

Three days before the doors to Citizen Public House & Oyster Bar finally open, a staffer meticulously stencils each letter of the massive whiskey menu, boasting 75 options—including a hand-selected Four Roses bourbon that's unique to the spot—onto the chalkboard. Owner David Dubois is MIA, having claimed brief sanctuary across the street at Tasty Burger, his other new restaurant in Fenway. That joint opened just weeks before, but its concept came long after he signed the lease on Citizen.

"HERE, IT'S ALL ABOUT THE COMMUNITY."

"I think it's everyone's dream to open a real West Coast burger shack," he notes upon arrival, "but the Citizen is what brought me to Fenway."

Dubois is no stranger to juggling multiple outposts. His Franklin Cafes (South End, Southie and Cape Ann) are late-night neighborhood staples, famed for their moderately priced menus. Loyalists can rest assured that the business model hasn't changed much. "I didn't want to dilute the name and just make it Franklin Fenway. This is a unique neighborhood."

The atmosphere at Citizen is more brooding than anything Dubois has done before, but caramel leather and a well-worn fireplace lightens the mood. Black tone-on-tone fleur-de-lis wallpaper adds gloss, and the bathroom is denoted by a glowing sign that reads "Loo." The menu, headed up by chef Brian Reyelt, focuses on American tavern fare, with an emphasis on roasted meats. The sea bass, grilled à la plancha with plenty of char on the edges, is served with bitter radicchio and escarole ($20). Breaking Dubois' tried-and-true, under-$21 formula, a full pig roast for 10 can be had for $380 dollars, but requires 72-hours' notice. Those who wish to go whole hog will also savor locally sourced seasonal vegetables and oysters.

Behind the burnished bar, Napa wines and 12 brews are on tap. Drinks, edited by mix maven Joy Richard, include made-to-order punches served scorpion-bowl style. Dubois adds, "Here, it's all about the community. Even the drinking!" KYLE WRIGHT

PAPAGAYO BRAND NEW BAG

Proof that Mexican is on the rise

IS MEXICAN THE CUISINE of the moment in Boston? Last issue it was Lolita Cocina in the Back Bay and Michael Schlow's upcoming Tico. Now there's Papagayo Mexican Kitchen and Tequila Bar from the folks at Legendary Restaurant Group (Max & Dylan's, Tavern on the Water, Scollay Square), slated to take over the former Persephone/Achilles space on Summer Street in South Boston.

Papagayo promises a scratch kitchen—even the tortillas will be house-made—a 23-seat bar serving more than 100 tequilas and reasonable price points, topping out at $19 for items such as chipotle-miso-glazed black cod. The aim is to draw value-conscious diners who appreciate everything from standard Mexican fare to Asian-influenced experiments. Think daikon radish root or jicama tortillas, and a trio of tequila sno-cones for dessert.

COGNAC BISTRO in Brookline, due to open this week, will feature a roster of cognacs, an extensive raw bar and seafood dishes like fusilli with octopus and bone marrow or organic Scottish salmon "coq au vin." Just outside Coolidge Corner, the former B. Good space at the intersection of Thorndike and Harvard streets will boast a faux zinc bar, marble tables and bistro mainstays.

BY THE TIME YOU READ THIS, True Bistro, an upscale vegan restaurant, may be open in Somerville's Teele Square. The menu includes small plates like black-bean and plantain torte, while larger dishes include seitan piccata and green curry with crispy tofu and black-rice cake. Other closings and reopenings: The Ivy Restaurant in the Ladder District has closed. In Brookline, Matt Murphy's is undergoing extensive renovations before reopening sometime in November.

Drink of the Moment

SOMETHING TO SNIFF AT

As a wine guy, 10 Tables beverage director Stan Hilbert follows his nose. In his capacity as captain, Hilbert's olfactory skill helps him find the right pairing for each plate. As the man who creates the cocktails, a judicious sniff is the first step toward an inventive drink.

Take this fall's TWISTED LICORICE ($10), which began with a whiff of absinthe's fennel-inflected aroma. "I thought, 'What's really good with fennel? Orange. So Grand Marnier," says Hilbert. "Then no, it's too thick, too syrupy, so let's cut it with some lemon." Bartending is often approached like baking—a regimented portion of one ingredient countered with a measured pour of another. With the 10 Tables bar area not yet a year old, Hilbert hasn't succumbed to such constrictions, letting his instincts play. "As simple as it is, it's probably the best trick."

Ten Tables
597 Centre St., Jamaica Plain (617-524-8810) tentables.net

For the season's second newcomer, THE EMERALD NECKLACE ($10), Hilbert starts with cachaça, a spirit rarely seen outside of caipirinha season. The scent of lemon in the bouquet led him to think of tea, and now a healthy dosage of the fermented sugar-cane liquor is matched with a reduction of green tea and five-spice syrup. "It grows on you," Hilbert says. "It has flavors you're not used to in a cocktail." And, like wine, the nose holds ingredients that aren't really there, with the scent of apples and pears highlighting this earthy autumn warmer. NICK ALTSCHULLER

Every week, the Cape Ann Fresh Catch delivery truck shuttles my share of ocean plunder from the Gulf of Maine to my local pick-up location. The community supported fishery (CSF) program, the brainchild of the Gloucester Fishermen's Wives Association, works just like a community supported agriculture (CSA) plan: You front a season's worth of cash to a fisherman who rewards you with installments of the day's freshest bounty: cod, hake, dabs, grey sole and bluefish (whole or filleted). It's a recipe for endless dinners of fish tacos, ceviches, stews and sautés.

THE BIG CHILL

Relaxation drinks. Fuel for an inactive lifestyle.

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

ENERGY DRINKS ARE A MULTI-billion-dollar business. Names like Red Bull and Monster stand at the top of the category, but parasitic brands such as Steaz, NOS or KaBoom are around to fight for the crumbs of profit.

My friend Adam is in the drink biz as the associate publisher of Beverage Spectrum Magazine and BevNet.com, and together we once toyed with the idea of entering the market. We even had product samples made of a shot we called Midnight Oil, but our plans never got off the ground. It may have been our complete lack of drive, capital or business sense, but failure was practically assured anyway. The category is oversaturated, and some people had doubts about the name. One former intern, Kyle, said it sounded like a sexual lubricant.

Down for the count

With the market sealed, some entrepreneurs have created an equal and opposite reactionary product: relaxation drinks. In the same cans packed with caffeine and B vitamins come beverages like Tranquila and iChill, infused with rose hips and kava root. The sector has little traction at the moment, with the sales leader pulling in just $5 million in revenue, but that just means there's opportunity for growth. So I decided to investigate the competition. As I was also starting a new position, I figured my nerves could use the help. Plus Kyle had returned as our new editorial assistant. Here was my chance to help with his first-week jitters, and exact revenge for that lubricant comment.

"This tastes like Dimetapp mixed with beer," said Kyle, sucking down a Drank. Debuting in this region last December, Drank is the category's most recognizable name. With ingredients like valerian root—which some studies have shown causes abnormal heartbeat—and melatonin—which can disrupt circadian rhythms—Drank pulls no punches in knocking you out. Never comfortable chatting with strangers, I chugged a can before an interview and magically transformed into punch-drunk Charlie Rose. I faltered; I stammered; I did everything short of drool. Across town, Kyle eventually passed out, missed two phone calls and ended up in bed by 9:30 pm.

Before a night out, I gulped a can of Lean, similar in formula to Drank. After meeting up with my girlfriend, she took one look in my dreamy, slightly glassy eyes, and accused me of being high.

There are less severe alternatives. Some, like Novocaine, which Kyle deemed a complete failure, feature kava root extract as the main active ingredient. I rather liked the Relaxing Tea, but even these lighter drinks come with printed warnings to not exceed two bottles per day. All of them claim to be lifestyle beverages, but I can't see how you can consume them while simultaneously leading a productive life. The only time I could draw a positive effect was when I'd face a project, drink a can, and then try and get everything completed before the melatonin kicked in.

That may have been the wrong approach, so I called Drank CEO Peter Bianchi, who apparently drinks his product throughout the day. As Bianchi sees it, Drank is a safe alternative to "the bottle of Jack Daniel's in your drawer for when you're pulling your hair out, or the bottle of Valium your doctor prescribed." At Hunter S. Thompson, Inc., yes, I suppose Drank is a healthier choice. But what of Drank's clear allusion to drank, aka lean, aka the recreational consumption of prescription-strength cough syrup? Hedges Bianchi, "In 'I Gotta Feeling,' when Fergie says 'Drank!' she's not talking about promethazine, she's saying 'Let's have a drank.' This is a celebratory beverage." I voiced my doubts about the product's viability, but Bianchi assured me, "Call BevNet. They'll tell you this is the most explosive category in the industry."

"Well, anyone with a brand is going to say that," said Adam, later on the phone. Fresh from a Vegas trade show, he'd seen a lot of new entrants to the market, but said, "It's still such a young category. Distributors are still hesitant and worried to pick up unknown products, just because they don't want to be burned."

While unpaid bills are an understandable concern, the bigger problem might be a target demographic too tired to purchase another can.

Truth be told, I drank a Red Bull before writing this. I needed the energy, and getting tasks done is what eliminates my stress. The two fingers of whiskey is the reward, not the crutch. But when the time comes to relax, I don't always need the help. I'm already sleepy. ✖✖✖

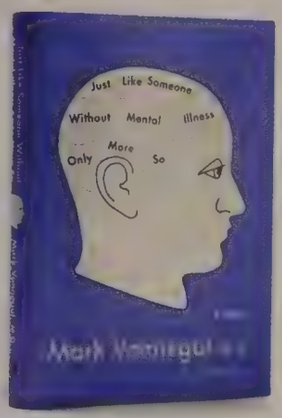
AMBER WAVES OF SANE



A trip through madness and back

ALTHOUGH MARK VONNEGUT has gone through four episodes of serious mental illness (schizophrenia or, more likely, bipolar disorder), he used them to extract a kind of Zen perspective. The title's curlicued mischief hints at his attitude towards his condition and other things, a blend of curiosity, wisdom and humor. Having applied, post-breakdowns, to 20 medical schools (ironically, only Harvard accepted him), Vonnegut became a stable, married, working pediatrician. But breakdown number four arrived midcareer when he tried to jump out a window and was straightjacketed and hospitalized.

The "lurching gobbledygook" of his delusions and his intense, apocalyptic hallucinations make, alas, good reading, perhaps because we know he recovers. Later, he goes on a medical mission to Honduras and returns to doctoring. Refreshingly, he criticizes some elements of managed care and medications. As a doctor who's both successful and impaired, he swings in the hammock of paradox. "Maybe I just had to learn to be comfortable with being uncomfortable, with being scared out of my mind, and to let it go past like it wasn't about me."

And father Kurt? Obliquely mentioned, seemingly difficult, and yes, some echoes here of that resonantly deadpan style. ×××

Just Like Someone Without Mental Illness Only More So
by Dr. Mark Vonnegut

Vonnegut lives in Quincy.

FROM PAGE 108: "Why is there so much meaning when the mind breaks? Why isn't it just static or nonsense? I became convinced that being willing to wrestle the Russian Bear could avoid a nuclear exchange and save millions upon millions of lives, not to mention the planet, from nuclear winter. The content of the voices and visions constitutes a hazardous nuisance to someone like me who so likes to figure out puzzles."

Posto brings modern Italian to Davis Square.

HOT STUFF Nonna's meatballs are coated in house-made mozzarella.

SINCE OPENING BERGAMOT last spring, chef Keith Pooler can count on one hand the nights he's missed in the kitchen. But he strategically planned a visit to fellow Somerville newcomer Posto, opened around the same time by Joe Cassinelli, a former coworker during their days at Excelsior.

Bergamot is locally focused with a farm-fresh menu revolving around an ever-changing list of blackboard specials. Posto follows suit with a menu centered on its roaring wood-fired oven.

The oven was cranking the night we dined, giving the packed, brick-lined, candle-lit room a smoky glow. A second appealing feature was Posto's wine program with its "Enzo" preservation system, which allows pricier wines (brunellos, Burgundies) to be served by the glass. I started with a Graff pinot blanc from the standard list ($9), while Pooler chose the more celebratory Lini Labrusca lambrusco ($11). At Pooler's request, our waiter guided us through the menu, pointing to a few of his favorites.

"I like asking the servers what they'd get," he explained afterward. "You usually get what's best. Or at least what they've tried in the last day or two."

And so we dove in, first with meatballs ($9) and chicken-liver mousse ($7). A small pile of hand-packed meatballs arrived smothered in a fiery pomodoro sauce along with house-made mozzarella. Pooler, however, was enamored with the mousse. Set in a shapely glass and topped with a silky port-wine reduction, it slid easily over slices of crusty bread.

"It's like peanut butter and jelly," he said with a grin.

Up next, the beet salad ($10): vibrant yellow veggies sliced thin, splayed out like carpaccio and topped with goat cheese and slender microgreens. A drizzle of orange-and-honey vinaigrette played up the beets' sweetness.

"I like that he doesn't do much to them," Pooler said. "Sure sign of confidence."

Pooler's own style is also simple, but not without its refinements. He honed his skills under Lydia Shire at Excelsior and later Scampo.

Describing his path, Pooler explains, "Before I went to culinary school, I made a game plan: I would be a chef by the time I was 30 and open a restaurant by 35." His timeline stretched longer while working as executive chef at Harvest, where he developed relationships with New England purveyors. At age 33, he was a chef. He opened Bergamot at 39.

As we moved on to more wine—Broadley pinot noir out of the Enzo for me ($14), Clifford Bay sauvignon blanc for him ($9)—he explained that his dedicated focus was a major reason why he and his partner, Servio Garcia, were able to open their restaurant (without hiring much help) in just 15 days. Pooler found Cassinelli to be a kindred spirit, as he'd done most of the work opening Posto himself.

Ready for something heartier, we moved on to the sugar pumpkin risotto ($18), which Pooler declared his favorite for its savory sweetness. Chunks of pumpkin nestled within thickened rice topped with balsamic, maple-chestnut butter and a pile of snowy Parmesan cheese.

Pooler's Picks

Nonna's meatballs
Chicken-liver mousse
Beet salad
Pumpkin risotto
Tiramisu

Eager to try one of Cassinelli's signature pies (he trained under the Associazione Verace Pizza Napoletana to perfect the Neapolitan style), I asked Pooler to choose from the 15 varieties, to which he replied, "Do you like spicy?"

My answer resulted in the pork sopressata ($15): puffy dough layered with tongue-lashing Tuscan peppers, melty mozzarella, thin slices of peppery salami and a mound of arugula and oregano. Tearing apart a bit of the crust, Pooler confessed it was too chewy for him. I found it chimsy for all those weighted ingredients but still a solid foil for the combo's heat.

A self-proclaimed sweet tooth, Pooler requested the massive, perfectly firm tiramisu ($5) for dessert. As we worked our way through the finale, Pooler nodded in appreciation. "It's like what we're trying to do," he said of Cassinelli. "He takes a serious level of cooking but still keeps it light." ×××

KINDLED SPIRITS

The iPad vs. Kindle debate, resolved

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

FOR MY BIRTHDAY THIS YEAR, Heather gave me an electronic tablet device. It's thin, wireless and I use it just about every day. No, it's not an iPad. In fact, that iPad's a bunch of frip-frappery that'll rot your brain. At least, that's what my Kindle tells me.

That's right, I've got a Kindle. I can't use it to play Angry Birds or find the nearest massage parlor or digitally attach a mullet to a photo of my dog. It won't make fart noises, even if you squeeze it in your armpit. Sliding your finger around on the screen will accomplish nothing except smearing around your finger grease.

And that non-touchscreen is also non-color. Below it are buttons, just like on the Tandy 5000. The Kindle is so low-tech it should be displayed in the Louvre with the Code of Hammurabi chiseled into it. In fact, the Kindle's so old-school that Andy Rooney bought one. He used it to start a fire, so he'd have enough light to read a book.

In the age of do-everything electronic devices, the Kindle does very little. And that's why I love it.

The Kindle combines the instant gratification of the Internet with the easy-on-the-eyes, extended-attention-span appeal of books. You decide you want a novel, and a minute later you have it, beamed through the air. And then, when you start reading, the e-ink screen eventually makes you forget you're not reading an actual book—to the point that you occasionally grab the side of the thing and try to turn the page. Sure, the Kindle's graphics make Oregon Trail look like Avatar 3D, but for reading text—you know, actual sentences filled with words—it's the best thing since dead trees.

And Kindle is a total snob. When you power it off, the screen morphs into a crude likeness of Ralph Ellison, Charlotte Brontë or some other author. If the Kindle wore glasses, they'd sit low on its nose and it would glare sternly over them if you made any noise in the library.

So far, I've used the Kindle to get about halfway through a new Bill Bryson title. While reading said book, I've not taken any detours to check e-mail or Facebook or look at a photo gallery of dogs wearing Halloween costumes. Which brings me to another point—the Kindle's dedicated bookishness is a buffer against the relentless onslaught of electronic media, which I feel is gradually making me stupider. Or is it "more stupider"? I'm not sure anymore.

For reading text—you know, actual sentences—it's the best thing since dead trees.

I consider myself well-informed, but reading magazines and newspapers doesn't fire the same neurons as reading books. And if you read online, you inevitably get sucked into the endless comments that accompany every story. Those exchanges are articulated in Internet-speak, a language entirely devoid of nuance or originality.

With Internet-speak, everyone picks up on trendy phrases and thus ends up sounding like everyone else. You might write that something is an epic fail and it should die in a fire. Or maybe you're in a more charitable mood and throw out some FTW's. Either way, you end up sounding like a generic Internet person. I try to purge my writing—even Facebook posts and text messages—of all Netspeak, lest I lapse into the habit. Sometimes I fail. Like I did right there, because the word "fail" is now a registered trademark of 13-year-olds writing from their moms' computers.

I'm a realist. No matter what you do, some portion of the material you read is going to subconsciously influence your own writing. With that in mind, I'd rather have my brain full of Bill Bryson than the breathless yammering of some belligerent half-wit drooling out strings of "Epic fail!" and "FTW!" Did you know that every time you read an emoticon, you kill a brain cell? And every time you write one, you kill 10. Kindle told me that.

Besides, I'm already too in thrall to the Apple empire. I have an iPhone, a MacBook, iPods and a .mac e-mail account. Every morning, Steve Jobs sends me an e-mail and tells me when I'm allowed to go to the bathroom, and he sends electric shocks through my iPhone if it detects that I'm saying nice things about Windows or Adobe Flash. Frankly, Kindle and I have had enough.

Sure, I'm sitting here writing this on my sleek, sexy MacBook Pro, but I can't wait to fire up the Kindle and have Bryson teach me about the history of Victorian architecture. Right after I take a look at these dogs dressed as lobsters. ✖✖✖

BRANCHING OUT

A return to an old winning formula

THE ONLY THING MISSING when the Baltimore Ravens came to town recently was John Facenda's voice. You remember how the legendary NFL Films voice-over would say, "It was the best of times"? That line came to mind as I summed up the Patriots-Ravens football game… aka the Return of Deion Branch.

The best of times were only six or seven years ago, but it seems like an eternity as our New England Patriots, or rather Bill Belichick, lost their way a teeny bit. The formula we saw against the Ravens—move the chains, spread the ball around and get the win—was once commonplace. Where did it go the last five years? It went with Ty Law, Deion Branch and Tedy Bruschi. When they left, it left.

Of course, they departed for a variety of reasons, specifically money and age. But the Patriots-Branch divorce was not a good one. Branch got his big contract, and the Patriots got some holes.

Brady's mantra of "throw it to the open guy" evolved into something very different than what had made him successful in the past. Sure, we had the blessed season in 2007, with two of the best receivers of this era, Randy Moss and Wes Welker. It was almost perfect. Bringing Moss to Gillette Stadium wasn't selling out. It wasn't brokering a deal with the devil, as we've often heard. The guy had a hell of a run here, and he gave Brady something he never had: a receiver who could outrun the competition.

The Brady-Moss duo almost pulled it off. They did their job, hooking up in the final three minutes of the Super Bowl with the Giants to give the Patriots a 14-10 lead. After that, take your pick in the Patriots goat department. Rodney Harrison tried but couldn't knock the ball away from one-reception-wonder David Tyree. Or then-Patriots cornerback Asante Samuel had an Eli Manning pass thrown right to him, but he couldn't hold it. Even after that, in the game's final seconds, Moss outran two Giants defenders, but Brady's pass was underthrown, allowing the play to be broken up.

The Moss experiment almost worked to perfection. I was never on board with the opinion that he was a "team killer." Without him, the Patriots haven't suddenly improved.

Brady and Branch are a great tandem, and they always have been.

But... the rebirth of Branch makes me believe that the good old days really are back. True, he was a disappointment in his four-plus seasons on the West Coast. He averaged less than four catches per game and less than four TD receptions per season. They got a decent receiver who was getting Pro Bowl money. (Branch took a $3.75 million base-salary pay cut after arriving in Foxboro.)

It's hard to fathom that someone who had been so good on the East Coast, with all the pressure we put on our athletes, was so bad on the West Coast. But some guys don't fit other teams. Branch fits the Patriots like a glove. He and Brady always had a certain chemistry, particularly in the big games. In the Patriots' last two Super Bowl wins, Branch caught 10 passes for 143 yards (and one TD) and 11 catches for 133 yards. In the 2004 AFC Championship, he hauled in four passes for 116 yards in Pittsburgh, including a 60-yarder for a touchdown.

Is it unfair to expect that kind of production? Probably. But Brady and Branch understand each other, even after being separated all these years. That first game back against the Ravens was special. Branch caught nine balls, the most since the Super Bowl victory over the Philadelphia Eagles.

I thought we shouldn't expect much from Branch because of the timing and the fact that he's 31 years old, which is ancient compared to the average NFL receiver. But I was wrong. Something magical happened on that Sunday. Branch was born again. Hell, Brady was born again, too, dinking and dunking the offense along like the good old days.

No disrespect to Randy Moss, but Brady and Branch are a great tandem, and they always have been. It's a marriage that might just get the Patriots back to playing football in February. ×××

TAKE 5

The School of Sports {RICH LEVINE}

ON CHUNG, BABY, TEK AND THE RED ZONE

5 SIGNS OF THE TIMES

Stuck In the Zone If you've watched the NFL Red Zone channel, you can skip this paragraph. You already know how it changes lives. If you're a fantasy addict, someone who dabbles in the gambling arts, or (gasp!) just like to watch football, you'll never be happier than you are during the six-hour, commercial-free broadcast. If you haven't watched, stop being so stubborn. It's the greatest football innovation since the computer-generated first-down line.

No Sox Talk There was a time when Red Sox rumors dominated local coverage, regardless of the season. It could be the week of a Colts/Pats game, and a "source" would claim the Sox were hot after some random journeyman reliever, and we'd all go nuts. "Oh man, Billy Pulsipher!?! Awesome!!"

QUIET KILLER Rondo's racking up the stats

Anyway, last month a rumor surfaced that the Sox were dangling Jacoby Ellsbury for Adrian Gonzalez, and the city barely flinched. It's a strange time in Red Sox Nation.

It's Called Bruins One reason you're not hearing as much about the Sox is because the Bruins have taken over talk radio. Bruins fans are now, without question, the most rabid in Boston, and with good reason. The B's championship drought is as old as Shaq. It's 38 years and counting since they last raised the Cup. But there's something about the young core of this team (Seguin, Caron, Rask, Lucic) that seems destined for something special.

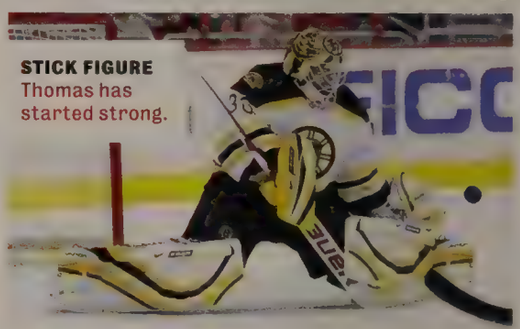
Surprise 17 Speaking of special, Rondo's 17 assists in the season opener weren't half bad. But that had to be the quietest 17-assist performance in NBA history. If you'd told me LeBron had 17 turnovers? Sure, I'm sold. But 17 assists? I had no clue, and that's just another sign of how ridiculous Rondo's become. Domination is the norm.

Thaaaaa Yankees Lose! Not unrelated to my previous point about the Sox, but I didn't get the same joy in watching the Yankees get bounced this season. It used to be a ton of fun to see them fail, mostly because that was the only October happiness we were allowed to experience. This year, I was just relieved. But we better watch out now that they've fired the pitching coach. He was clearly the only problem.

1 ONE BIG BABY

Glen Davis always had the potential to be a legitimate NBA player. It's just that he's always struggled with having the emotional seriousness of an NBA cheerleader. But this year's different. The emotions are still there, but they're kept in check, and his skills are finally receiving the bulk of the attention.

2 SOX OFFSEASON PREDICTIONS



Oh, Canada Now that we've said good-bye to Jason Varitek, doesn't it make sense for him to follow John Farrell up to Toronto? I'd compare it to when Scott Pioli poached Mike Vrabel ... although Tek's not nearly as deadly on the goal line.

I Smell a Splash They need to do something big, don't they? I mean, can the fan base handle another bridge year? Gonzalez might be tough. Cliff Lee might be tougher. But if David Ortiz's eventual extension is the biggest news of the winter, I'd be surprised.

3 Very Important Body Parts (The No Favre Edition)

Chung's Knee The Pats dodged an enormous bullet when Patrick Chung's knee injury didn't turn out to be serious. Not that a one-to-two-week absence is ideal, but when those two games come against weak Minnesota and weaker Cleveland, then we'll take it. I think it's still safe to say he'll have the best season of any Chung in Patriots history. Sorry, Eugene.

Pierce's Back Of all the injuries Paul Pierce could've been hit with on opening night—a sprained ankle, a bruised elbow, a gash above the eye after being jabbed by LeBron's inflated sense of self-worth—the old "bruised back" is a serious pain in the ass. When you get to 33, a sore back is the kind of injury that can linger. And it's more annoying than the Cranberries' song.

STICK FIGURE Thomas has started strong.

Tuukka's Ego Yeah, I know. Not technically a body part. But let's hope that at 23, Tuukka has the confidence and maturity to cope with the presumably temporary resurgence of "Thomas Time." Damn, that's not nearly as fun to say.

4 DATES TO WATCH

11/7: The Pats look to grab a road win in Cleveland, which shouldn't be as daunting after Mangina revealed every trick play in his arsenal to beat the Saints.

11/10: Bruins at Penguins. It's Sid the Kid vs. Ty the... crap, I don't know. Isn't it time we come up with a nickname for this guy? (PS: I kind of like Seguin Genesis, but we can do better.)

11/11: "What do you want me to do?" LeBron asks. Hmm, how about you lose your fifth straight game to the C's? Boston travels to Miami for Big 3 vs. Big 3, round two.

11/14: The Pats begin the defining stretch of their season. At Pittsburgh, home against Indianapolis, Thanksgiving in Detroit and then Monday night against the Jets. Yeeikes.

"Sports are a microcosm of our society as a whole."

Soroff On WENDI NIX

The ESPN reporter talks about locker-room awkwardness, competitive shopping and Tom Brady's hair.

SPORTS ANCHOR WENDI NIX, 36, COVERS FOOTBALL and golf for ESPN, which she joined as a reporter in 2006. A South Carolina native, she earned a master's degree in sports management from UMass Amherst in 1997, and began her TV career in South Carolina. Returning to Boston, she worked for NESN, FoxSports and WHDH-TV Channel 7. On ESPN, she hosts NFL Live and College Football Live while contributing to SportsCenter, College Game Day and Sunday NFL Countdown. She has covered the U.S. Open, the Masters and the British Open golf tournaments. Nix lives in Westport.

Jonathan Soroff: Were you a tomboy?
Wendi Nix: Yes. I just loved to play any sport. I wasn't very good, but it didn't stop me.

So you're a guy's girl?
Probably. But I have a really girly side, too, which probably comes as a disappointment to people when they find out I like to shop.

Football or shopping?
Well, football's my favorite sport. I enjoy golf, but football's my first love.

College or pro?
College, as a fan. If you're working it, the pros are generally in cities that are easiest to get in or out of. I'm constantly on the road.

Is sexism alive and well in sports reporting?
Perhaps it's a bit more defined, because there can be sexually charged environments, but I always feel disingenuous talking about it because I've never had any trouble. I really haven't. In the same way, I think it matters what you look like in this business, but I also think it matters what you look like on Wall Street or anywhere else.

Are pro athletes overpaid?
I think it's supply and demand, and I believe in the market.

What percentage of them are on steroids?
Probably depends on the sport. I would venture to say that 10 years ago, it was much more rampant than we realized. But I also do think it's changing.

Strangest thing you've seen in a locker room?
[Laughs.] It all seems a little strange. Honestly, the fact that athletes are as quirky and superstitious as the rest of us. It always strikes me as odd when they need to have their little bear in their locker, or whatever.

Weirdest superstition you've seen?
Probably Nomar Garciaparra, just because he had so many. There were eight or nine things that he absolutely had to do the exact same way every single game of his life.

Most awkward locker-room experience?
Well, they're nude a lot, so I guess I'm used to that. It's always intimidating walking into a locker room, if you don't cover the team regularly and you're just parachuting in. If you're familiar with the people, it's no big deal.

What do you think of Tom Brady's hair?
I'll say this much: It's reached the ponytail stage.

Do you get insulted by being referred to as a "sideline hottie?"
No, I think that when you get to be 35, you're just glad you're referred to as something.

Favorite NFL uniform?
I like the Packers. I like the whole Green Bay tradition. I like everything about them.

Dream Super Bowl?
The Panthers and the Jets, played in Arizona.

Strangest story you ever covered?
Brett Favre's first un-retirement. It had every human element you can imagine: jealousy and greed and hurt feelings and egos. It was a soap opera.

Ever wanted to do hard news?
I think sports are a microcosm of our society as a whole, and I don't think you can be a sports reporter without knowing what's going on in the world. I'll have these young kids say to me, "I only read the sports section or read sports online," and I tell them they're way off base.

Sport that should be in the Olympics?
Well, they switch them so often, I can't keep track. Shopping maybe? [Laughs.]

Sport that shouldn't be in the Olympics?
I bet you're thinking of curling, but I love it!

Key to good tailgating?
It's all about the food.

Favorite beer?
Bud Light. I'm a cheap date.

Monday Night Football snack?
Wings.

Coach you love to hate?
Let's go with Rex Ryan of the Jets.

How much do you study or research the business end of the industry?
Quite a bit, actually. I have a business background, and I'm sort of an economist at heart. And sports are a business, just like television. We don't talk about the collective bargaining agreement every day, but if you don't understand what that process is about, I just don't think you can do the job correctly.

Secret player crush?
No. [Laughs.] That's easily avoidable once you get to know them.

Is a giant TV a must for a Super Bowl party?
Yeah, this is the thing: I don't understand the obsession with the giant TV, which is where I'm a total chick. Why does it have to be so big? The TV, I mean. [Laughs.]

Favorite team mascot?
The Oregon Duck. I love him. He does push-ups every time they score, and they're scoring like crazy right now, so I'm a little concerned for his health. But I love that duck.

Most unpleasant person in pro sports?
Drunk fans.

So who's gonna win the Super Bowl?
It's such a weird season so far. There's so much parity. I think the Patriots have as good a chance as anybody. ×××

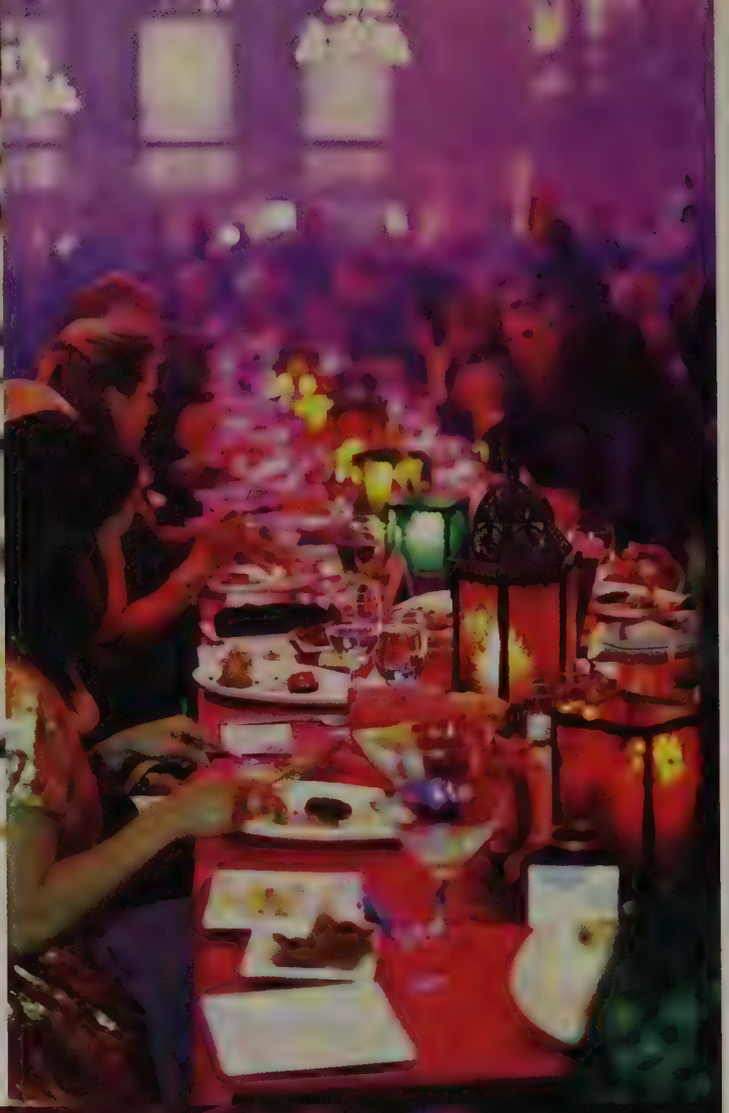
The Life of BRYAN



BY NANCY GAINES / PHOTOGRAPHS BY AVIRAN LE

From Back Bay ballrooms to Chelsea Clinton's wedding, when it comes to throwing a big-ticket bash, Bryan Rafanelli rules the scene.

IN THE DETAILS

AT AN EXPENSIVE FUND-RAISER LIKE THE STORYBOOK BALL, ATTENDEES EXPECT LUXURIOUS FOOD AND AN INVENTIVE SETTING.

ROSE PETALS FLOWN IN from Holland. Authentic Moroccan lanterns. Real swaying palms. Torrid tablescapes under a canopy of swirling silk. Champagne, lobster and a "fez-tival" of desserts in an opulent homage to casbahs and bazaars.

Behold, the 11th annual Storybook Ball—this year's spin is Aladdin—to benefit Massachusetts General Hospital for Children. Tonight's gala, held at the Park Plaza Castle, aims to be one of the wildest magic-carpet rides this city's ever experienced. The overseeing genie behind this night—and 1,000 and one like it—is Bryan Rafanelli, event impresario extraordinaire. From President Obama to Chelsea Clinton to the local philanthropists hoping to raise a pile of dough from tonight's fez-tivities, Rafanelli has made a boatload of wishes come true.

These days, Rafanelli Events choreographs as many as 100 functions a year, from a $5,000 private dinner to a party worth $4 million. He won't say whose fête tops the list, but scuttlebutt has it that the July wedding in Marblehead of Fidelity pasha Peter Lynch's daughter, Elizabeth, to a French royal, takes the cake for opulence.

Rafanelli has a knack for attracting gushy testimonials. "All his clients love him," says Geri Denterlein, a Boston public-relations maven who has frequently used his services. "Bryan has a unique ability to articulate a vision," adds fund-raiser and cupcake queen Courtney Forrester. "He applies his talents equally to projects large and small, shoestring budgets and sky's the limit resources."

The limits reached the stratosphere last summer when Rafanelli orchestrated the multimillion-dollar extravaganza of Chelsea Clinton's wedding to Marc Mezvinsky. With the world's gossip pages sniffing at his every step, he demonstrated discretion and aplomb. A precise, cheerful man whose job is to create enchantment out of chaos, Rafanelli makes trafficking in fun look easy. "Of course it keeps me up at night sometimes," he says. "I care as much as if it were my wedding, my product, my fund-raiser."

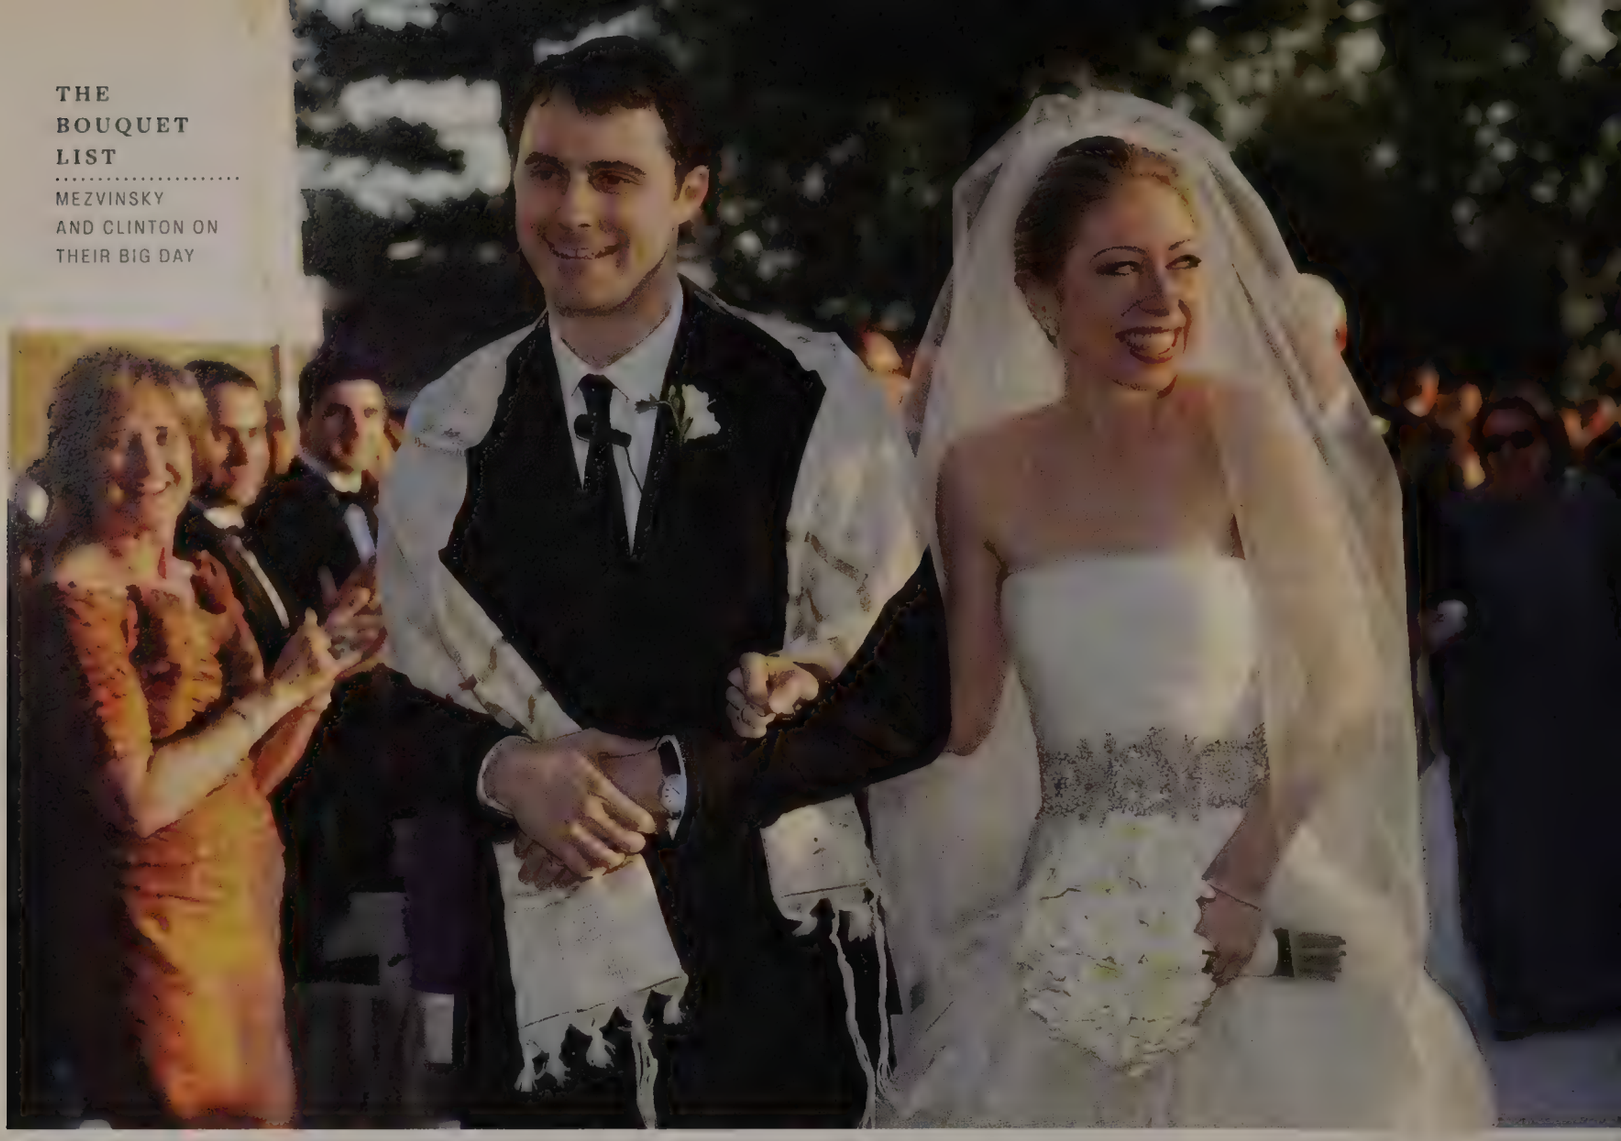
WHILE PERFECTION IS ever the goal, Rafanelli is the first to admit it's not always the result. From toppling cakes at his own sister's wedding to the no-show valets at the close of a Palm Beach luncheon for Laura Bush, he's been stung by fortune's slings and arrows. But when life hands him lemons, he turns them into tall glasses of cold lemonade, which he served to the 250 Palm Beach ladies wilting in the 90-degree heat while he, his staff and the kitchen help ferried Bentleys and Rolls' to the waiting doyennes. "The talent of Bryan is that if the soufflé flops, the client doesn't know it," says Mark Walsh, Rafanelli's one-time business partner and longtime life partner.

Adds the maestro himself, "The art of being a good producer or planner is to plan for perfection, so when there's a crisis, we're OK. We're ready for it."

The 48-year-old Rafanelli finds calm amidst such occasional storms naturally, which is to say it's in his genes. He was raised in Warwick, R.I., one of six children, two of whom became lawyers like dad, who passed away in March. Growing up, Bryan emulated his mother, an admired hostess. At Syracuse University in the early 80s, he organized parties for his fraternity, including a now-legendary farm-themed fête involving more than a dozen chickens that he managed to set loose in the school library.

Claudia Kronenberg Photography

He was the life of the party, so he decided to make parties his life.



After graduating in 1984, Rafanelli studied interior design, worked at Filene's and volunteered for the AIDS Action Committee, where he organized special events. "One of my first smaller events with impact was Hula Hoopla in Provincetown," he says. Toymaker Mattel donated the hot-pink hoops, which Rafanelli festooned around town to promote a fund-raiser at a local bar. He was the life of the party, so he decided to make parties his life.

"Back then, we did a kitschy thing, and it took off," he says. "Now, fund-raising for nonprofits"—which accounts for about 30 percent of his business—"is a science. You sit with the committees, you present ideas, you refine them, you meet again and again. You make all these ideas seem like they're their ideas."

"Bryan's got the knack for the big picture. He's the master strategist on how to raise funds," says Billy Evers, Rafanelli's creative director for almost 12 years. "I'm embedded in the creative end. We complement each other."

For all that, Rafanelli may be at his best when it comes to planning weddings—those very special occasions that often turn brides into monsters and grooms into zombies. "It can be overwhelming. Clients can feel like their heads are exploding," he says. "I'm the guy who has to bring them back to Earth. I have to get the 'zilla out of bridezilla."

NOW THAT HE'S become the rock star of party planners, Bryan Rafanelli, the celebrity, is in almost as much demand as his services. While he attends many of the events his company handles, plenty of clients never meet him. "When you buy Armani, do you expect to meet Giorgio?" he asks. "Part of the business is to pass on the breadth of experience, to hire great people."

THE BOUQUET LIST

MEZVINSKY AND CLINTON ON THEIR BIG DAY

With a staff of 25, Rafanelli Inc. has offices in West Palm Beach and Washington, D.C. He opened his Florida outpost because many of his Boston clients have homes there, while his Washington office grew out of his work for the Obama inaugurals and for Hillary Clinton's Senate and presidential campaigns. Explains Rafanelli, "When Hillary went to the State Department, D.C. became a good secondary market."

Rafanelli met the Clintons through his clients Gerry and Elaine Schuster of Chestnut Hill, who raised millions first for Bill, then for Hill. His other Clinton connection was Mark Walsh, a lawyer and political consultant who managed the business side of Rafanelli Events for 12 years.

"We've got this celeb thing, which eludes a lot of people in Boston."

Walsh was Hillary's liaison to the gay, lesbian and transgender community during her presidential campaign. Rafanelli organized a luncheon in Boston for her back in 2001 and personally helped raise more than $100,000 for Clinton's presidential foray. When Walsh worked on Obama's inaugural committee, he had Rafanelli do the candlelight dinners.

Taken together, Rafanelli had the needed credentials to manage the Wedding of the Year. Cloaked in secrecy, he and an extraordinary cadre of Clintons set to work on the wedding details. The parents, the bride, the groom and Hillary's mother attended every planning meeting. Rafanelli acknowledges that having all the relatives involved was a departure from his usual modus operandi. "Believe me, that doesn't happen. But when Chelsea and I talked about the wedding, it was really important that it be planned with her family, especially the three generations." He was willing to break precedent for such a special client.

In his promotional material, Rafanelli gives equal billing to his celebrity and corporate customers—Aerosmith and Hank Williams Jr. are on the same level as the American Heart Association and the YMCA. But he says that's misleading.

"I did events involving the celebs, but my success is built on what we do really well, not the people we work for." So why list them? "Because it's what everybody wants to know. It's frustrating. So the list is there but I don't want to dwell on it. Chelsea and Marc chose Rafanelli Events because they were drawn to what we do. But since then, we've got this celeb thing, which eludes a lot of people in Boston. Not as much now, thanks to Ben Affleck, but this is not a celebrity-driven town."

Like, say, New York, where he's often summoned by Gothamites such as fashion designer Carolina Herrera. Despite New York's glamour and giant customer base, Rafanelli insists he's not hankering to move his operations to the city that never sleeps. "I'm not jumping ship," he says, "but would I love to do an event in Bryant Park or Central Park? I would hunger for that."

A CAUSE FOR APPLAUSE

A GOOD HAUL FOR A MAJOR BENEFIT IS $1.25 MILLION.

RECESSION ASIDE, Boston high society still digs deep for its favorite charities and the 15 or so top-tier annual galas. A good haul for a major benefit is about $1.25 million gross. The record seems to be held by last year's Children's Hospital Champions for Children's fund-raiser, which brought in $2.5 million. In its previous 10 years, MGH's Storybook Ball averaged $1.4 million. This year, the hospital expects the gross to top $1.6 million. Of that, MGH for Children may net as much as $1.2 million, if Rafanelli's projections hold true. Compared to industry standards that find a cost of 35 to 40 cents to raise $1 acceptable for nonprofit special events, Rafanelli says he spends closer to 25 cents on the dollar. How? "Ah, the secret recipe," he says, laughing. "Experience, common sense and pressing my fine family of vendors on cost."

Then there are those golden touches he calls "income inducers," such as the carnival-type booths at tonight's Storybook Ball, where guests can play games, win big prizes and donate more cash to the cause. Income inducers are "a way to get people to forget about how much money they've already given," Rafanelli cheerfully admits. The booths will add an estimated $225,000 to the ball's proceeds, says MGH's Marion Kassler.

Today, with all the pomp and artifice attached to the posh events on the social calendar, the party planner has to be one part shrink, one part referee—and often stern tastemaker. "Let's say I go to great lengths to articulate why we should do something else. Maybe because it's too garish. Maybe it's out in left field. Sure, sometimes I just say no.

"I want the best, which is not necessarily the most expensive. I mean, some wedding planners want to do rose petals on the bed. Do you know what a pain in the ass it is to get rose petals off a bed? I'm way too practical for that."

Which brings us back to the Storybook Ball, a year in the planning with a cast of 200. Transforming the cavernous Castle into The Arabian Nights has taken three days. The checklist today alone included 44 items, from rehearsals and sound and light checks, to cleaning the restrooms and passing the fire-marshal inspection.

It's about an hour to go before the doors open. Rafanelli, in sneakers and tight jeans, surveys the scene and smiles. "The precision on this one," he pronounces, "was perfect."

If parties like this are Bryan Rafanelli's life, it follows logically that he sees his life as one long party.

"What do I do for fun? My life, baby!" he says, with candid glee. "I'm very successful and have a good time doing it." ×××

THE GOOD LIFE, ACCORDING TO CHEF JOANNE CHANG

BY LEAH MENNIES

JOANNE CHANG IS BUSY. There's her wildly successful Flour Bakery + Cafe mini empire, which serves her signature house-made Oreos, lemon-raspberry cakes and sticky buns to sweet-toothed residents of Fort Point, the South End and, most recently, Central Square. Then there's Myers + Chang, the modern-Asian spot she runs with her husband, restaurateur Christopher Myers. Factor in Flour, her new cookbook, and you've got a 70-hour workweek that leaves little time for fancy dinners or cocktail parties. "I don't get out much. That's the problem," Chang says.

With plans to promote her cookbook through the holiday season while making sure that "Flour3" is up to speed, Chang isn't slowing down anytime soon. "People ask all the time, 'What's next? What's next?'" she says. "I kind of want to chill and see what happens with these three bakeries and Myers + Chang."

Then she remembers that she has other ambitions. "I'd love to write a Myers + Chang cookbook," she says. "I've been talking to my publisher about the possibility of doing that."

Though on any given day you'll likely find her dressed in a Flour T-shirt and jeans while snagging granola bars off the snack tray or working the line at Myers + Chang, she still knows how to raise the glitz factor for a night out or put away a dessert (or eight) at a great restaurant. Here are some of the sticky-bun whisperer's favorite indulges for those rare occasions when she can enjoy her ultimate luxury—time. › › ›

FISHY TREAT:

Oishii

They do omakase, which is when the chef takes the best of what he has that day and creates a meal for you. So it really just depends on whatever Ting [San, executive chef] has in his kitchen. He's incredible; he sources really, really rare fish and vegetables straight from Japan. Every time I go there, he's got some new presentation or ingredient or something that he's showing us.

FROZEN TREAT:

Oleana and Picco

I love ice cream, and the baked Alaska at Oleana is incredible. It's so hard not to eat it all. I love ice cream at Picco, from [chef/owner] Rick Katz. He also does a warm gingerbread with a scoop of ice cream that's really, really good.

EXPENSIVE TREAT:

Menton

It's an experience, and they really treat you almost like royalty. From the moment you come in, everybody is so gracious. It's not cold, and its not snobby at all. We had a butter soup, which was basically just lobster and caviar with this incredibly rich butter emulsion that was sort of like a soup, but was really lots of butter.

WARDROBE TREAT:

AllSaints Spitalfields

I love [AllSaints'] shoes, I love their dresses, I love their shirts. I think that everything is just really fun, comfortable and funky. I didn't know anything about it, and my husband got me a dress—and I loved it.

SHOE TREAT:

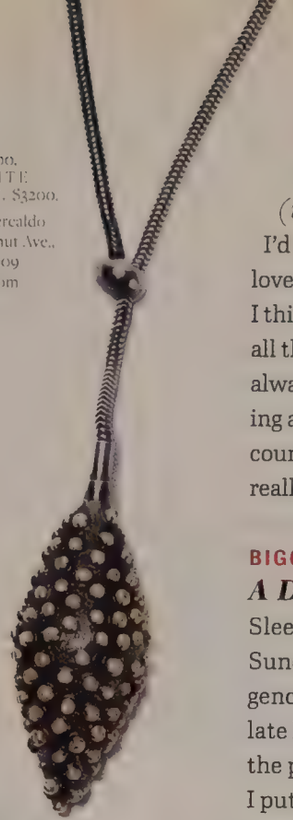
Louis

We just went to Louis, and I bought a dress and shoes. We were going to a wedding, and I got these gorgeous [Balenciaga] heels. They were like four-and-a-half inches. Christopher picked them out, and sent me the link in an e-mail and said, "I just put these shoes on hold for you. You've got to go."

HUSBAND TREAT:

Christopher Myers

He's got great taste. He knows me and my body well. He knows what works for me and what doesn't, so he can just look at something and say, "You've got to try that on." He's really helpful because I'm not that good at it.



SHOE TREAT, REVISITED:

Christian Louboutin, Gucci

I have a bunch of Christian Louboutins. They're shoes that just fit me well—I don't even have to try them on. And Gucci, I have two or three pairs that I like a lot. It's one of those things where you find a designer that fits your shape and makes shoes that you feel comfortable in, and you try to stick to them.

Both at Michele Mercaldo Jewelry, 280 Shawmut Ave., Boston, 617-350-7909, michelemercaldo.com

COSMETIC TREAT:

Fresh "Sugar Plum" Tinted Lip Treatment

I just got this, and now I want to go back and buy it all because I'm scared they're going to stop making it. I don't know what that smell is.... I put it on all the time just because I like the way it smells.

HAIR TREAT:

James Joseph Salon

I go to James Joseph. I have a great stylist. Her name's Margaret, and she doesn't give me a hard time when I cut my own bangs.

GALLIC TREAT:

Paris

We left on Christmas day, and we spent two weeks there. We shopped and ate, and we stayed in a house, we didn't stay in a hotel. There was a market where you could get food and cook at home. There was TV, you could read. We spent the days just walking around, and shopping and eating and going to patisseries. That's when we got engaged.

FUTURE TREAT:

Asian Street Food (in Asia)

I'd love to go to Southeast Asia. I'd love to do a bike trip there, actually. I think that would be great—to eat all the great street food that I'm always reading about and dreaming about, and to travel through the countryside on a bike so you could really see things.

BIGGEST TREAT:

A Day Off

Sleeping in as late as I can on Sundays is my favorite indulgence. Christopher and I have a late breakfast together and read the paper and do the crossword. I putter around the house; he watches football or golf. We go for a long walk/run together and catch up.... We're both so busy, and we're working at the restaurant/bakeries all the time. We see each other a lot—but time alone is rare, and one-on-one time with each other is hard to find. ✖✖✖

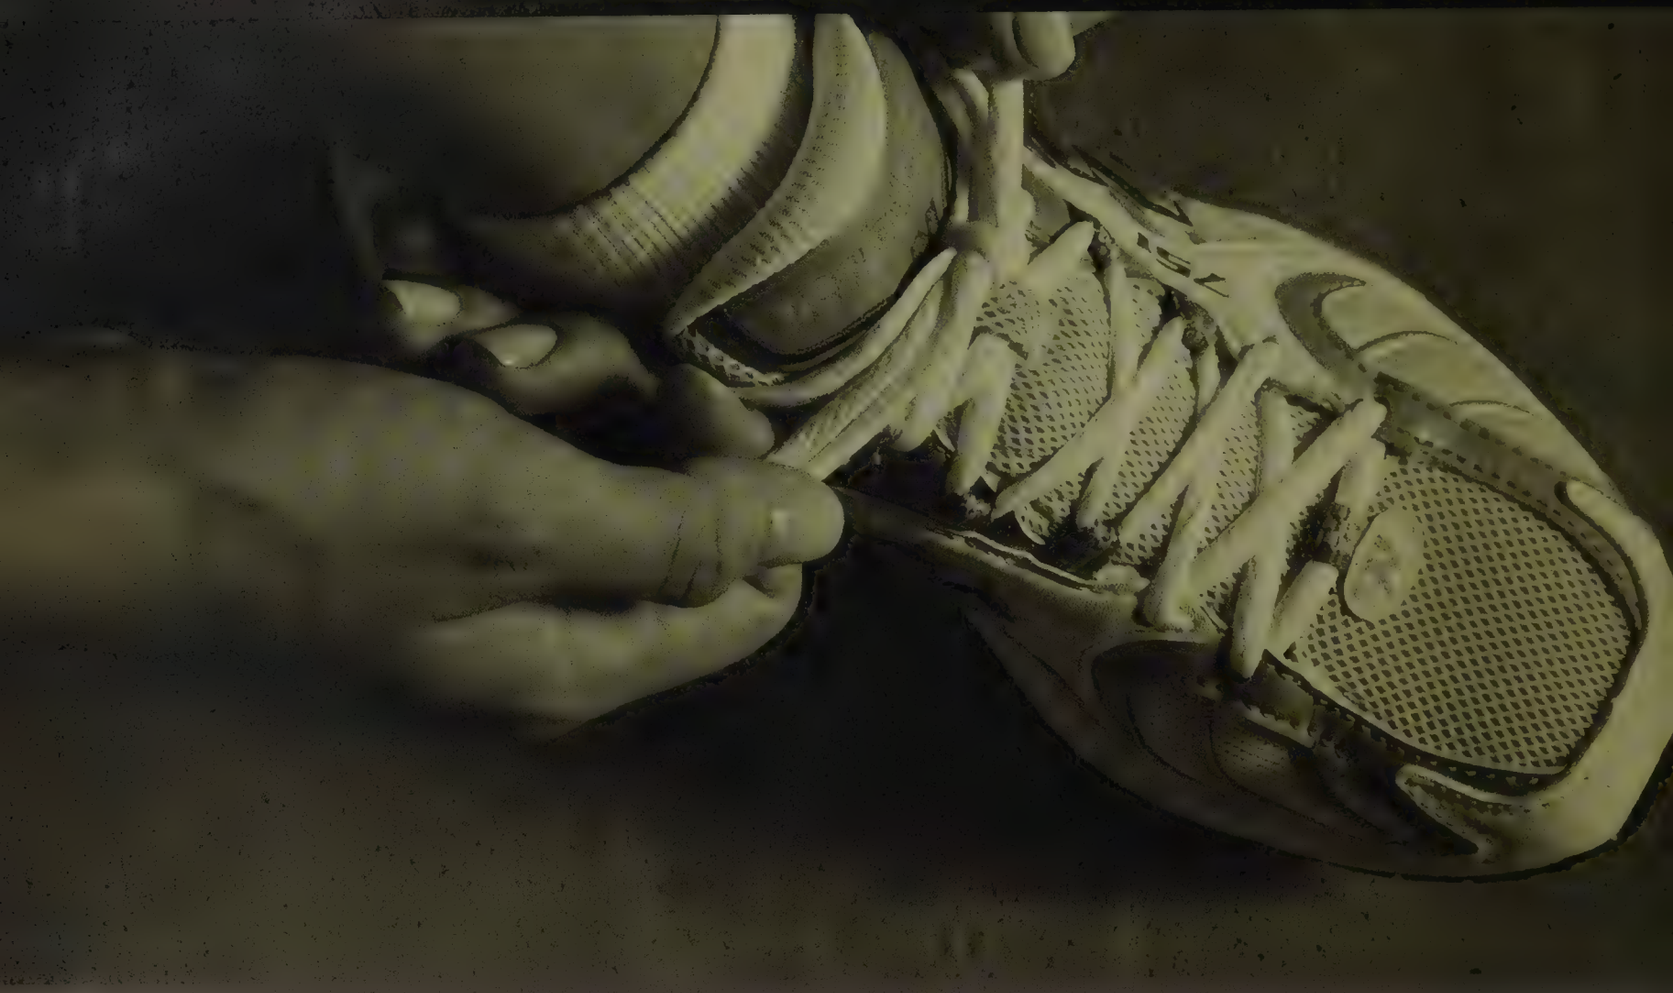
My team is called Urban Fresh. We're four individuals from different backgrounds, ranging from wardrobe stylists to PR reps and designers. We're trying to bring awareness to Boston fashion—we're not from New York just because we're stylish.



We're trying to do events for people who want to go out, but not to clubs, and also raise AIDS awareness. Our events may have live bands, spoken word, wine, beer and a little fashion show.

Sometimes I know exactly what I want. And sometimes I just see it and think, "Oh, you belong in my closet. I need you in my life."

My shoes are Alexander Wang. I saw them on Jourdan Ambrose, whom I love, and got a lot of inspiration from.

SIPPING POINT

WHILE TRADITIONALISTS may cluck about crumpets and clotted cream, Bostonians have always approached tea with an adventurous mindset. At the Ritz Carlton this month, the genteel afternoon caffeine break has taked a turn for the modern with an Autumn Cupcake Tea. In addition to steaming pots of Mighty Leaf brew, the menu includes flights of mini cupcakes in seasonal flavors like pumpkin pie, and "apple harvest."

A Body of Work

Modern Family Families come in all shapes and sizes. When the comfortable life of two partnered women is interrupted by a photographer famous for his female nudes, the gloves (and pretty much everything else) come off in the SpeakEasy Stage Company's production of Body Awareness, running through Nov. 20 at the Boston Center for the Arts. Annie Baker's one-act comedy plays on raw emotion, family tension and the search for connections between people. Baker's small-town setting also appears in Company One's production of The Aliens (through Nov. 20) and the Huntington Theatre Company's Circle Mirror Transformation (through Nov. 14) as part of the Shirley, VT Plays Festival. Steve Church

Circle Mirror Transformation Boston Center for the Arts, Wimberly Theatre, 527 Tremont St., Boston (617-424-0694). huntingtontheatre.org. MBTA: Orange Line to Back Bay. Through Nov. 14. Wed.-Thu., 7:30 pm; Fri.-Sat., 8 pm; Sun., 7 pm. Matinee: Sat.-Sun., 2 pm. $25-$55; $15, student rush. Four students in a drama class find that theater games lead to real-life drama in this comedy. The American ★★★ ½ A triumph of form over content, director Anton Corbijn's curiously affecting mood piece follows George Clooney's haunted, aging assassin as he hides out in the Italian mountains of Abruzzo. Synced to a different time signature than most contemporary thrillers, The American comprises long silent spells and existential dread. Cinematographer Martin Ruhe paints a lush canvas of verdant riverbanks and dim, foreboding nighttime streets. The anxiety in the stillness gets under your skin. Clooney isn't just getting more annoyingly handsome as the years go on; the sonofabitch is also becoming a better actor—simultaneously bolder and more restrained. The American calls to mind his heartbroken astronaut in Steven Soderbergh's underrated Solaris remake. Showing no trace of his gregarious movie-star persona, Clooney is gaunt and haunted. Often banished to the far corner of the widescreen frame, he methodically scans the surroundings for threats, never at rest. Playing a man with no past and no future, he lives only in the precarious present. Corbijn's impeccably controlled filmmaking hammers home the loneliness of this condition. (In the suburbs.)

Catfish ★★ What to make of Catfish? A Sundance sensation that purports to be a stranger-than-fiction true story, the movie doesn't ever feel like it's playing on the level. Is this all some sort of Borat-style performance piece? And if so, why isn't it more interesting? (I must tread lightly here to avoid spoilers.) An annoyingly overemotive young man named Nev Schulman works as a freelance photographer in New York City. One day, he's contacted by eight-year-old Abby Pierce, an art prodigy living in Michigan who enjoys painting portraits of his photos. Nev becomes a mentor to Abby, then, via Facebook, finds himself smitten with her entire family. We're supposed to buy Nev falling head over heels for Abby's 19-year-old virgin half-sister, sight unseen, but most of Catfish feels fake, as if Schulman and his coconspirators stumbled into a wild story and retroactively shot additional bogus footage to make themselves look like suckers for the first hour. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Conviction ★★ A small-screen picture with a big-screen cast, Conviction tells the true story of Betty Anne Waters, a gutsy Northern Massachusetts waitress whose wayward brother, Kenny, was wrongfully accused of murder. As played by Sam Rockwell, Ken's a bit of a wild man, but he sure as heck ain't no killer. Plucky Betty Anne seeks to prove her big brother's innocence—gosh darn it—even if she has to go to law school herself to get the job done! Hilary Swank headlines as Betty Anne, bringing that specifically Swank-ian strain of toothy gumption that sometimes makes you wish Clint Eastwood would drop by and euthanize her again. The blandly inspirational Conviction goes down painlessly, with a minimum of you-go-girl montages and even less suspense. We never have any doubt as to the outcome or any question of Kenny's innocence. There's just not a lot of conflict in Pamela Gray's screenplay, which strikes me as odd considering that it's about a gross miscarriage of justice that cost a man 18 years of his life. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

Easy A ★★★ With her barbed line readings and world-weary precociousness, Emma Stone has the poise and charm of a less tragic Lindsay Lohan. Stone runs away with this tart teenage riff on Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter. She plays a good girl pretending to go bad in order to enhance her social standing at a prim and proper high school that's lorded over by judgmental Christian kids. It's a welcome skewering of the promise-ring culture, with a game Amanda Bynes providing some gut-busting laughs as a messianic proto-church lady, and two sublime supporting turns from Patricia Clarkson and Stanley Tucci as Stone's hippie parents. Lisa Kudrow and Thomas Haden Church costar as faculty members boasting some suspicious extracurricular activities, while director Will Gluck is able to slip in satirical jabs without going over the top into message-mongering. The busy visual scheme is a bit much, as are the ubiquitous John Hughes references, but Easy A's a breezy lark announcing the arrival of a major star. It isn't quite Clueless, but it'll do. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Inception ★★★ ½ Ever since his art-house smash Memento, writer/director Christopher Nolan has been obsessed with smashing up the syntax of conventional thrillers. Inception is the kind of pet project that could only happen in the wake of The Dark Knight, as Nolan scored a couple hundred million dollars by helming one of the biggest blockbusters of all time. Inception is an expansive, expensive brain-bender rooted in genre satisfactions; half Solaris, half The Matrix.

PARADISE LOST

Clint Eastwood takes a hit-and-miss look at faith.

Hereafter ★★½
Starring Matt Damon, Cecile de France, Frankie and George McLaren, Jay Mohr, Bryce Dallas Howard, Richard Kind and Derek Jacobi. Written by Peter Morgan. Directed by Clint Eastwood. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

SOLEMN, HEARTFELT AND A little goofy, the 32nd feature directed by Clint Eastwood will never be confused with his masterpieces. It's his most uneven work behind the camera in years, unusually shaped and, at times, tonally confounding. Despite these flaws, Hereafter also contains moments of beauty and startling power, making the sloppiness forgivable, occasionally even endearing.

It begins audaciously with a sequence of terror as elegantly constructed as any in the filmmaker's career. After a languid introduction to Marie (Cecile de France), a popular Parisian news anchor vacationing in Indonesia, we're abruptly tossed into a horrifying recreation of the 2004 tsunami. Astounding as these special effects may be, Eastwood avoids the CGI disaster-porn of junk like 2012.

Rather than cutting to wide shots of sheer spectacle, he keeps the camera locked down at Marie's eye level, making the mass destruction immediate and personal.

Something happens to Marie underwater, and she briefly glimpses another world full of shadowy silhouettes standing before a bright white light. Forever changed by her near-death experience, Marie becomes obsessed with the subject, and then politely slinks to the narrative sidelines for a while.

Meanwhile, over in America, Matt Damon's George Lonegan is sick of seeing dead people. A reluctant psychic who turned his back on a lucrative career to work in a factory, he knows all too well what awaits us after the final curtain. Though blessed with the ability to convey messages from the departed to their loved ones, George feels, and repeats a few too many times, that his gift is more like a curse.

Damon's stuck delivering a lot of the script's most egregious mumbo jumbo.

Damon is a direct and unfussy performer, and his reticence is a natural match for Eastwood's laconic style. It's no wonder that this is their second collaboration in as many years. Damon's stuck delivering a lot of the script's most egregious mumbo jumbo, and there aren't a lot of movie stars who could make a psychic reading feel so casual and offhand. It's a far trickier performance than it may appear on the surface, and he grounds Hereafter's supernatural trappings in a believable reality.

Unfortunately, screenwriter Peter Morgan borrows the multitrack playbook from awful films like Babel and Crash, squeezing in a third storyline in another distant locale. Frankie and George McLaren play plucky London twins struggling in a crummy housing project and covering for their junkie mom whenever the folks from social services come calling. Tragedy is of course inevitable, and one poor brother tries to find closure from a bevy of sometimes very funny New Age scam artists.

As in every movie using this template, the three disparate storylines must eventually converge in some sort of credulity-straining coincidence, preferably one with hefty metaphorical import. What's interesting about Hereafter is the way Eastwood downplays the tidiness of Morgan's script, forgoing the typical "interconnectedness of all things" sermonizing we've come to expect from such stories. The film dawdles around quite amiably, exploring character quirks and odd embellishments that most directors would leave on the cutting-room floor.

There's a marvelous detour in which Bryce Dallas Howard plays Damon's desk-mate at a night-school cooking class, and the movie slows to luxuriate in their flirtation. There's also room for a lovely turn from comic actor Richard Kind, and a just plain weird one by Marthe Keller at a creepy Switzerland Hospice Center. Derek Jacobi even drops by to play himself, reading aloud from Little Dorrit seemingly just for the hell of it.

Growing less interested in the title subject as the film progresses, Hereafter seems more concerned with loneliness in this life than anything that happens after death. Time and again we return to Damon eating meals alone in his kitchen, just as isolated and aching as those who've lost a loved one. But as these characters begin shaking off their grief, colors bleed back into the images and the shadowy chiaroscuros of Tom Stern's cinematography start to lift.

At 80 years old, Eastwood has earned the right to do whatever he damn well pleases, and Hereafter is nothing if not reflective of his specific sensibilities. The unhurried pace, tinkly piano score and lackadaisical continuity are pure Eastwood, and despite seeming out of his league handling supernatural subject matter, it's really just another spin on the story he's been telling since The Outlaw Josey Wales. Hereafter is ultimately the tale of three scarred loners at long last rejoining the community, which if you're willing to stretch, is like starting a new life after death. ★★★

Leonardo DiCaprio stars as a sullen corporate espionage agent slinking around Kyoto stealing valuable information by infiltrating people's dreams. Cleverly layered, the movie jumbles four separate realities into continuous sequences, as action scenes happen simultaneously across different dimensions but with the same characters. It's a huge movie full of meaty ideas, even when the backbreaking ambition begins to feel like a grind. (At Aquarium and in the suburbs.)

Inside Job ★★★ ½ Documentarian Charles Ferguson—who helmed the extraordinary Iraq documentary No End in Sight—turns his attention to the 2008 economic meltdown. The results are harrowing, infuriating and laced with a surprising strain of gallows humor. Narrated by Matt Damon, Inside Job provides an invaluable guide to credit default swaps and collateralized debt obligations, making Wall Street jargon accessible to even a numerically challenged lunkhead like yours truly. It's hard not to get your ire up watching these exorbitantly compensated robber barons fleecing pension funds with falsely rated junk investments. Ferguson has a gift for clarity, explaining derivatives in ways that flummoxed Michael Moore in last year's dismal Capitalism: A Love Story. Cathartic but less successful is a sequence in which the filmmaker questions a few econ wizards. It's fun to watch them squirm but feels cheap in comparison to the rest of the picture's razor-sharp outrage and simplicity. Everybody who's in some money trouble should see this film. So I guess that means just about everybody should see this film. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newtom.)

Jackass 3D ★★★ ½ During the decade or so James Cameron spent toiling away on groundbreaking advances in 3-D technology, I wonder if he ever imagined that all his hard work would someday result in a movie where a man plays the trumpet with his butt. Jackass 3D is a technological marvel, the first 3-D motion picture I've seen that justifies that garish surcharge at the ticket booth. Using the cutting edge of stereoscopic effects and cameras, this is stupidity with impeccable technical credentials. OK, so all these brilliant innovations are in the service of genital trauma and flying fecal matter, but it helps that I'm a cretin, and this kind of thing makes me laugh uncontrollably. The gags aren't as death-defyingly baroque as they were in 2006's Jackass Number Two, but the boys aren't getting any younger, either. There's a contagious jubilance to the idiocy of Johnny Knoxville and company, if you dig this sort of foolishness. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

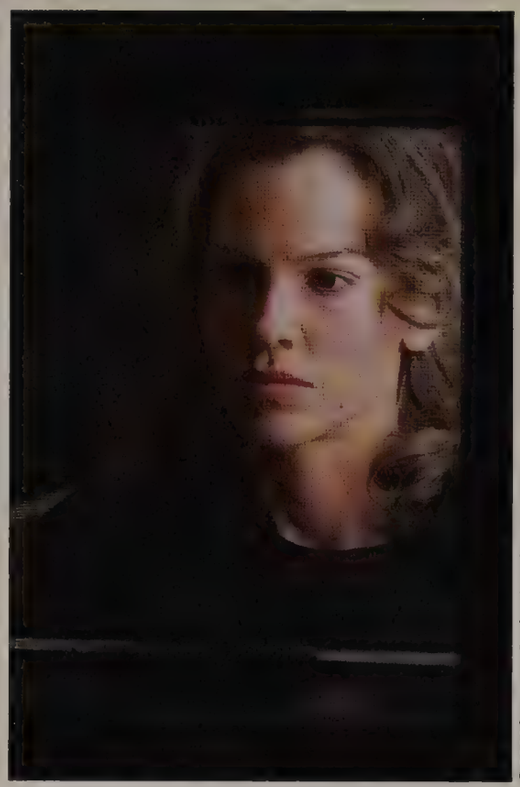
The Marks the Merrier



High Interest Rate When bored and lonely Frederik Feinermann witnesses a client shoot himself because of a denied loan, the bank clerk transforms into a modern-day Robin Hood. With the help of an ex-con, Frederik begins robbing his rich clients' homes to give money to the poor. Filled with dark humor and entertaining action, Schwerkraft (Gravity) shows us the life of an everyday employee whose rush for excitement may have gone a bit too far. Catch the premiere of the German movie on Nov. 14 at the Coolidge Corner Theatre. Sofia Constantin been allowed to cut loose like this in eons. She's a lost New Age girl trying to get her groove back, while Bening's tightly wound wine aficionado scores all the haymaker put-downs. Cholodenko's last film was 2002's wonderful Laurel Canyon, and Kids hits the same raunchy comedic heights. In Cholodenko's world, middle age is a funny and sexy place to be. (In the suburbs.)

Let Me In ★★ ½ Don't tell Stephenie Meyer, but sometimes vampire lovin' isn't so romantic. Matt Reeves instantaneous, entirely superfluous remake of Tomas Alfredson's 2008 art-house hit, Let the Right One In, takes a dim view of interspecies swooning, as Kodi Smit-McPhee's bullied child falls under the spell of Chloe Grace Moretz's undead girl-next-door. Adopting Alfredson's stark, wintry compositions (sometimes frame for frame) while staying loyal to the muted latchkey-kid malaise, the Cloverfield director comes up with a dutiful exercise in movie karaoke. Too bad the film has no reason to exist. Besides slimming down the supporting cast and tinkering a tiny bit with the third act, Let Me In has nothing to offer that wasn't already available in its superior Swedish incarnation. Moretz is a scant bit more accessible than her animalistic predecessor, but otherwise this is secondhand material with no personality of its own. It's an awful lot of trouble to go through just because some people don't like subtitles. (In the suburbs.)

Machete ★★ Based on a two-and-a-half minute trailer Robert Rodriguez shot for the 2007 mega-bomb Grindhouse, Machete stars B-movie icon Danny Trejo as a monosyllabic Mexican Shaft, sending up blaxploitation tropes with a Mexi-Cali accent. Like most Rodriguez movies, this one was shot on the cheap in Austin and contains enough wit and invention to entertain the audience for 15 minutes. Too bad about that last hour and a half. Robert De Niro embarrasses himself trying to send up a certain Arizona senator, but finds himself outclassed by a couple of startlingly game performances from Don Johnson (as a redneck militia madman) and Steven Seagal (as a crime lord wondering how he didn't get at least a cameo in The Expendables). Meanwhile, Lindsay Lohan gets naked, Jessica Alba is saddled with some ill-advised political speeches and all of Rodriguez's low-rent gore-hound fantasias never quite congeal into actual scenes. He should just make trailers. (In the suburbs.)

Acquit While You're Ahead

Sapped of Suspense

Hilary Swank's Conviction is judged and found lacking.

The Other Guys ★★★ Every bit the movie Kevin Smith's Cop Out desperately wanted to be, Will Ferrell's fourth collaboration with his Anchorman director Adam McKay is another take on the oft-parodied milieu of 1980s mismatched buddy pictures. Except unlike Cop Out, this film has actual laughs. Ferrell tones it down and actually acts for a change, playing a forensic accountant stranded on desk duty. Supercops Samuel L. Jackson and Dwayne Johnson get all the glory, destroying entire city blocks chasing down pot dealers, while Ferrell and his frustrated partner, Mark Wahlberg, chase down a much more insidious band of Wall Street swindlers. Even at his most restrained, Ferrell's mugging can grow tiresome. Good thing Wahlberg plays all this nonsense totally straight. He takes the role so seriously, you'd think he was up for another Academy Award. Marky Mark huffs and puffs as if nobody told him he was in a comedy. His reaction shots are better than any of the jokes. Nobody plays exasperation better. (In the suburbs.)

Paranormal Activity 2 ★ ½ More of the same, yet it feels like even less. The quickie prequel to last year's smash once again mines a couple jolts and tons of tedium from surveillance footage of damnation's most passive-aggressive demon. Set a couple months before the events of the original picture, Paranormal Activity 2 switches McMansions and focuses on the sister of doomed Katie Featherston. The budget increased from 15 grand to 2.75 million, but the scares are still doggedly lo-fi. As before, this demon initially comes off more like a lousy roommate, turning on the lights, leaving the cabinets open and making noise while everybody's trying to sleep. The ante is upped for the sequel, though, as the otherworldly intruder sometimes takes the automated pool cleaner out of the water. Chilling. By now you know the drill: static wide shot of a dark room at night. Hold with eerie silence on the soundtrack. Eventually a door shuts REALLY LOUDLY. Rinse, wash, repeat. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Red ★★ ½ A terrific concept that barely survives a botched execution, this overscaled adaptation of the DC comic stars Bruce Willis as a former CIA agent having a terrible time adjusting to life in the suburbs. When his old team is marked for elimination by the new regime, he's got to hit the retirement homes, round up his old partners and stay one step ahead of these damn, know-it-all kids. It's an irresistible premise, particularly for fans of the "Get Off My Lawn" genre best epitomized by The Expendables or anything starring Clint Eastwood. Red fills out the ranks with a killer cast, perhaps the most overqualified we've seen in a movie mainly concerned with blowing stuff up. Morgan Freeman is all sly smiles and John Malkovich brings the crazy as a paranoid casualty of the CIA's LSD experiments. Too bad a boilerplate, conspiracy-theory plot shuffles everybody from one exploding set-piece to the next. You can't go wrong with Dame Helen Mirren firing a machine gun, but Red comes awfully close. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Social Network ★★★★ You might be put off by the prospect of a movie about Facebook, but remember that Citizen Kane wasn't really about the newspaper industry. Like that classic, The Social Network uses a media magnate as an entry point to a story more concerned with loneliness and megalomania. It plays like gangbusters. The unlikely pairing of heart-on-his-sleeve, West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin and clinically dyspeptic, Fight Club director David Fincher is unexpectedly revelatory. Zipping back and forth in time from dorms to deposition rooms, the movie isn't so concerned with legal questions of authorship as it is with class differences and the concept of a level playing field in our tech-savvy era. The last shot is a doozy, though. Sorkin and Fincher might as well be saying: "I'm sorry, Mr. Kane, but Rosebud has still not accepted your friend request." (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Stone ★ ½ Hard to believe, but the sight of Edward Norton in cornrows is one of the least ludicrous things about director John Curran's overripe melodrama. The setup is the stuff of pure pulp, with Norton's greasy convict using his sexpot wife (Milla Jovovich) to blackmail his parole officer (Robert De Niro) into allowing an early release. The logic seems suspect: If you were sleeping with a dangerous criminal's wife, wouldn't you want him to remain behind bars for as long as possible? But then Norton has some sort of bizarre epiphany, prompting him to join a wacky made-up faith based on cosmic audio frequencies, and that's when Angus MacLachlan's screenplay loses its mind. Stone flips from lurid noir to spiritual inquisition, pontificating endlessly about religion and its role in society. In case we're in any danger of missing the point, De Niro and his single grumpy facial expression are never not listening to Christian talk radio, with fire-and-brimstone hosts always conveniently discussing whatever just happened in the previous scene. (At Boston Common and Waltham Embassy.)

Tamara Drewe ★★ Based on a Posy Simmonds' comic strip that appeared in The Guardian, which itself was a reworking of Thomas Hardy's Far From the Madding Crowd, the latest from prolific director Stephen Frears is an English country pastoral rife with raunchy humor and literary in-jokes. At a writers' retreat run by a chronic philanderer (Christopher Hitchens look-alike Roger Allam) and his long-suffering wife (Tamsin Greig), the return of the title character (Gemma Arterton) sets the idyll village atwitter, as she's blossomed into a knockout and benefited quite nicely from a nose job. The strapping farmhand next door (dull Luke Evans) has always had eyes for Tamara, but, alas, the games of musical beds being played in this town require a scorecard. Frears is aiming for a retro, earthy, sexy romp, but this cast lacks the charisma to pull it off, and the moldy old punchlines could use some polish. Despite all the men clamoring over our heroine, Arterton remains an attractive cipher. (At Kendall Square.)

The Town ★★ The kind of movie about Charlestown that only somebody from Cambridge could make, writer/director Ben Affleck's latest symptom of townie street-cred envy is chockablock with dropped R's, Celtic tattoos and preposterous gangster movie clichés. Casting himself as the kindest, most-sensitive bank robber a gal could ever want, Affleck models a stunning number of local sports insignias and offers close-ups of his sculpted physique doing pull-ups. Adapted from Chuck Hogan's novel Prince of Thieves, The Town lurches from one dead-end plot thread to the next, piling increasingly absurd action sequences atop mawkish arias of self-pity. Mad Men's Jon Hamm trails two steps behind the gang as a distractingly scruffy FBI agent. Only The Hurt Locker's Jeremy Renner, channeling Jimmy Cagney by way of the projects, makes an impression, but even he gets short shrift in Affleck's maudlin climax that's half–Shawshank Redemption, half-naked narcissism. The final shot is the most unintentionally hilarious thing I've seen in ages. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Toy Story 3 ★★★★ So this year's summer blockbuster for adults turns out to be a contemplation of mortality and obsolescence starring a bunch of animated plastic toys. You might reasonably wonder if we critics ever get bored writing love letters to Pixar, especially when it comes to a long-delayed sequel that on the surface appears to be geared toward audience familiarity and 3-D price-gouging gimmicks. Yet these sons of bitches have done it again. Tom Hanks' cowboy Woody and Tim Allen's career-redeeming Buzz Lightyear find themselves put out to pasture once young Andy heads off to college. They're confined to a shabby daycare center that carries eerie echoes of senior-citizen homes across the land. What follows is a rousing jailbreak adventure with a tragic undertow, tackling serious questions of death and abandonment in a mature manner that would make Ingmar Bergman proud, if only he'd played with dolls. This is a treasure. (In the suburbs.)

Waiting for "Superman" ★★★ An Inconvenient Truth director Davis Guggenheim really wants to depress you. As if chronicling the impending end of the world wasn't enough, Guggenheim now sets his sights on our country's troubled public-school system with predictably dire conclusions. Slapping a giant "kick me" sign on the back of powerful teachers' unions, Waiting for "Superman" follows a handful of promising inner-city kids hoping to make the lottery for their local, thriving charter schools. I won't pretend that I'm knowledgeable enough on the subject to gauge the veracity of Guggenheim's blanket assertions, and I'm fully willing to admit that he's overlooking larger issues like systemic poverty and obvious societal inequities. But all that said, the film remains a deeply moving experience. How does your heart not break while watching the fates of children surrendered to a random drawing? (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

You Will Meet a Tall Dark Stranger ★ ½ Another of Woody Allen's annual exercises limps into theaters, full of moneyed infidelity, old jazz standards and rote pessimism. It's tempting to just cut-and-paste from my previous reviews of Allen's late-career output, as that seems to be how he writes his screenplays these days. A recycled recitation of the filmmaker's pet themes, You Will Meet a Tall Dark Stranger has all the verve of a contractual obligation. Anthony Hopkins (himself no stranger to half-assing his way through movies) stars as a rich London lout who, spooked by contemplations of mortality, starts going to tanning salons. He quickly takes up with a gold-digging prostitute half his age, leaving his wife to seek the solace of a fortune teller. Meanwhile Naomi Watts and Josh Brolin go through some marital woes of their own, leading to familiar Woody rants about the meaninglessness of life in a godless existence. At least he used to throw in some jokes. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

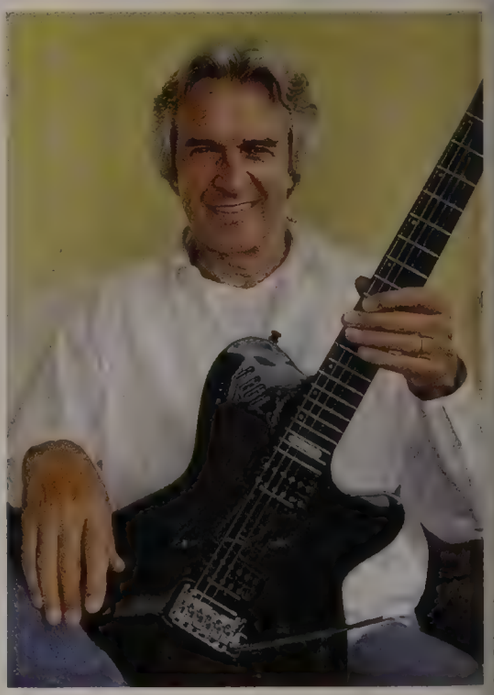
Music { PAUL ROBICHEAU }

COMPLICITY



John McLaughlin fuses jazz, rock and spirituality in the 4th Dimension.

John McLaughlin and the 4th Dimension play the House of Blues on Nov. 16.

GUITAR PIONEER JOHN McLaughlin could've rested on his laurels long ago. Fresh to New York in 1969, he joined groundbreaking jazz-rock trio the Tony Williams Lifetime and recorded his first of three albums with trumpet titan Miles Davis. One was the fusion landmark Bitches Brew, sporting a mercurial track that Davis titled "John McLaughlin."

In the '70s, the English-born guitarist brought jazz-rock speed and intensity to unmatched heights with his Mahavishnu Orchestra before shifting to acoustic guitar for the transcendent Shakti, which deeply integrated traditional South Indian music before future world-music trends. He's continued to cross the map, from his guitar trio with Al DiMeola and flamenco legend Paco de Lucia to symphonic concertos and various fusion projects.

Today, at age 68, McLaughlin is far from retiring. "I'm going to be working 'til I just drop down dead," he says from his home in Monaco. "There's so much to do. There's so much to find out."

Ines Behrend

For his new disc, To the One, recorded with his current jazz-rock outfit the 4th Dimension, McLaughlin reflected on John Coltrane's classic A Love Supreme. "This recording is almost a subconscious connection to that momentous event in late '64 when I first heard that record," says McLaughlin, who related to Coltrane's reaffirmation of faith, reflected in that album's liner notes, as well as in the music, blending the spiritual dimension into jazz."

To the One came to McLaughlin out of the blue. He was on a break from writing and performing last year after a tour with fellow Davis alumnus Chick Corea in the Five Peace Band. But when he was out to dinner one night, music began popping into his head, so he grabbed a stack of napkins to jot notes.

The stream of ideas bubbled for months, capped by a night when he awoke with the song titles and liner notes in his head as well. "It doesn't really have any logical, rational explanation," the guitarist says. "But then, music is not exactly what you'd call a rational profession, is it? Or it shouldn't be anyway."

The classically trained McLaughlin came into the profession as a self-described "jazz snob" who still loved the Mississippi blues and Elvis Presley, though he balked on the Beatles until their psychedelic phase. "They were tripping like everybody else, but they were writing beautiful music," says McLaughlin, who also gave guitar lessons to Jimmy Page when they were teenagers.

During the next several years, he played pop sessions for Burt Bacharach and Petula Clark, and served in jazzy R&B groups before absorbing free jazz in Belgium prior to his move to New York. "I experimented with feedback—there were no distortion pedals in those days," he says. But I quit that, because to play free jazz, you have to be a wonderful musician and a great human being. Too much self-indulgence. I'm a big fan of restraint."

Restraint may not be the first thing that comes to mind with the Mahavishnu Orchestra, which balanced raw abandon with pinpoint control, as McLaughlin became known for lightning-fast guitar runs. But even when he summons similar zip on To the One tracks "Discovery" and "The Fine Line," he conveys a relaxed feel.

"It's like fast waves on top, but underneath you feel the long waves," McLaughlin says, citing the layers of rhythm that he enjoyed in playing with tabla maestro Zakir Hussain—his foil in Shakti and its '90s reincarnation Remember Shakti—and ex-Coltrane drummer Elvin Jones. It's almost multidimensional."

McLaughlin finds a similarly broad percussive snap in the 4th Dimension, where keyboardist Gary Husband doubles on drums with Mark Mondesir while bassist Etienne M'Bappe holds the bottom.

"Complicity" is the word McLaughlin uses to describe the mutual understanding between musicians. "When you have real complicity expressed in a group, it's very joyful," says the guitarist, who brings the 4th Dimension to the House of Blues on Nov. 16. "It's essential in a way to good music, because we're inspiring each other and pushing each other."

He felt it in the groups of Coltrane and Davis, whose photos he still displays in his work space. One image of Davis, he says with a chuckle, just gets me every time. I have it very close when I'm working, 'cause he's looking at me with this little smile on his face, like 'You think you're good, huh?'" ***

Spirit in the Guy

Holy Roller Sufjan Stevens offers an unlikely mix of folk, spiritualism and sex appeal. The 35-year-old Detroit native attracts an eclectic crowd of different ages and musical tastes (even though his base is mostly adoring college-aged girls). His live shows spring to life with both his signature emotional croon and his ability to play a multitude of instruments while wearing giant bird wings. See this unique folk experience take flight Nov. 11–12 at the Orpheum Theatre.

From the Inside, Out

Arresting Imagery Most people never know what it's like to look at the world from behind bars. Viewing the prisons of America through his unique lens, Stephen Tourlentes' photographs of the cold walls of confinement accentuate the dichotomy of life within and without. Currently a visiting professor at MassArt, Tourlentes displays his images at the Institute of Contemporary Art through Jan. 17 as part of the 2010 James and Audrey Foster Prize Exhibitions, alongside works by eight other local finalists. Matt Nannis

Man Up

Tough Love From Adam Carolla, the guy who created iTunes' top-rated podcast, comes In Fifty Years We'll All Be Chicks. At BU's Barnes and Noble on Nov. 3, the former host of The Man Show won't be sharing a soft-spoken, impartial critique of contemporary America. Instead, you'll hear his frustrations with an irrational culture that idolizes mediocrity and glorifies celebrity. With a no-nonsense, comedic narrative style, Carolla delivers a kick in the pants to the modern man.

An impressive Wine Cellar and discreet Parlor Suites are the solution to successful business entertaining and private dining. Complimentary car service available in metro Boston.

OM RESTAURANT AND LOUNGE BRUNCH [92 Winthrop Street, Cambridge, 617-576-2800 www.omrestaurant.com] In the center of Cambridge, overlooking Harvard Square, Om Restaurant and Lounge offers more than just dinner and nightlife. OM's Saturday and Sunday brunch is served from 11:30 am to 3:00 pm weekly. Chef Michael Madden displays an array of specialty dishes that will definitely liven up anyone's senses. Dishes such as the Kobe Burger with sugar cured bacon or the Yogurt Parfait, will make you think twice about staying in bed. Outdoor seating is available on the patio or for cocktails in the garden. Check out Om's website for weekly events and Private Dining options.

SUNSET GRILL & TAP [130 Brighton Ave., Allston, 617-254-1331] SUNSET CANTINA [916 Commonwealth Ave., Boston, 617-731-8646] "Beer's not just for breakfast anymore." At the Sunset Super Sunday Brewers Brunch, try our thick-cut French toast, potato skins and eggs, eggs benny, crispy quesadillas or our All You Can Eat Brunch Taco Bar, including a free Sunday paper and your first beery mary or mimosa. Full menu also available. 112 taps, 300+ microbrews.

he best way to meet an incredible woman in a bar, lounge, or social unction is not to trawl around with a pack of dudes, hang with your ossessive female best friend, or wander the social scene as a shy, solo guy.

What you need: a confident, outgoing - paid - woman by your side, who can approach other unsuspecting women on your behalf and n your company. In other words, a professional WINGWOMAN!

- Our WingWomen are attractive, confident, relaxed, and sociable.
- We will take the awkwardness out of figuring out what to say to a woman in whom you are interested.
- Instead of using a dating site, where one tries to judge what a person is really like from pictures and misleading profiles,our clients see their prospective partners in person.
- By hiring a Boston WingWoman, you are greatly increasing your chances to meet a lady of interest!

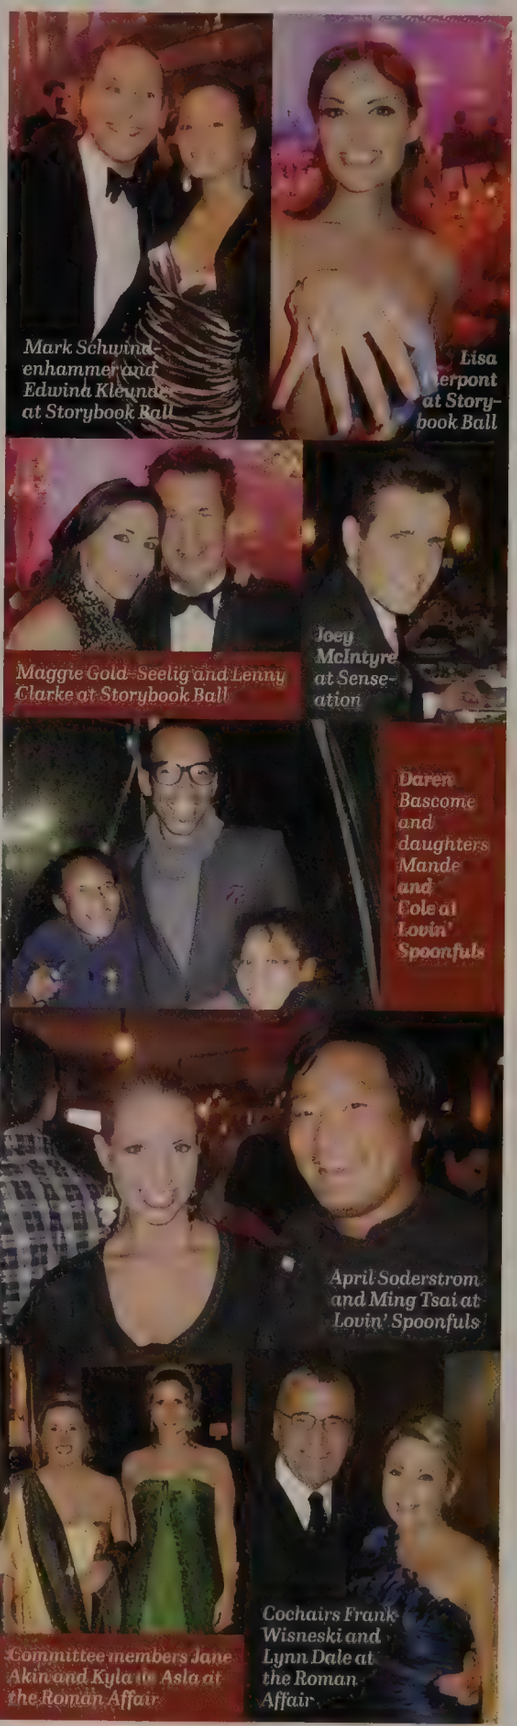
ONCE UPON A TIME

I Dream of Genie

If the Storybook Ball had really granted my wish, as the invitation promised, I'd be on a beach in Bali right now, but no matter. The Aladdin-themed gala for MassGeneral Hospital for Children transformed the Park Plaza Castle into the durbar of a maharaja's palace, full of palm trees, candlelight and billowing fabric, where guests feasted at long tables and could, if they felt like it, feed their dates a date.



Unfortunately, the only monkeys were wearing tuxedos, but all of Boston's worthies were there, like cochairs Bill and Alli Achtmeyer, smoldering blonde Darlene Jordan, the lust-provoking Mark Schwindenhammer, a male model claiming to be emcee Lenny Clarke, yummy mummy Maggie Seelig (celebrating her 21st birthday) and her partner-in-crime Lori Sidman, their adorable other halves, Jonathan and Matthew (respectively), red-hot mama Nancy Adams, and Newbury Street's answer to Tom Ford and Nate Berkus, Michael Tilley and Peter Griglik. The evening was so entertaining, it wasn't until days later that I learned my boyfriend had played a carnival game and won a gift certificate for a three-month membership to the Sports Club/LA. But he can't remember what he did with it.

The Time Warp Again

One of two things was bound to happen: I'd either feel like a fossil or discover my inner teeny-bopper at Sense-ation, a fund-raiser for the Mass Eye and Ear Infirmary held at the Renaissance Boston Waterfront Hotel and featuring a performance by New Kids on the Block. It was hosted by Celtics poobah Wyc Grousbeck, and his wife, Corinne, and Now-Approaching-Middle-Age Kid Joey McIntyre and his stunning model of a wife, Barrett, and it attracted the likes of über-chefs Lydia Shire and Michael Schlow and every fat cat who eats at their restaurants.

Dinner was better than I expected, and everywhere you looked was someone whose name regularly appears in bold print. When the New Kids took the stage, it was like 1988 again.

"For 14 years, we were in a hyperbaric chamber," joked McIntyre, who does look good, as do Donnie Wahlberg, Danny Wood and Jonathan and Jordan Knight. But as entertaining as the evening was, it made me feel old as dirt.

Feed the Need

Besides sounding like a breakfast cereal best eaten in the nude, Lovin' Spoonfuls is a charity that rescues food for the needy. An everyone-who's-anyone crowd showed up for its very first fund-raiser at Myers + Chang.

A short list: Hizzonah Tom Menino, Renaissance woman Sharyn Fireman, design avatar Daren Bascome with daughters Cole and Mande, morning mouth Matt Siegel, the impish Benson Willis and his always-smiling husband, Dan Avery, etc. The good news: The evening was a success, and everywhere you looked was delicious grub by the likes of Ming Tsai, Joanne Chang and CJ Husk from Island Creek Oysters. The bad news: The charity relies on uneaten food, and there wasn't a morsel left.

O Tempora, O Mores!

It's not often that a presidential motorcade bumps up against a Roman orgy, but that's what happened when the Boston Lyric Opera held its Roman Affair at the Mandarin Oriental Boston, next to where President Obama was speaking.

The opera event was undoubtedly the more elegant and entertaining of the two—an ersatz birthday party for everyone's favorite syphilitic fleshpot, Nero, and although one guest complained about the lack of nude slaves to hand-feed her grapes, the evening was fit for an emperor. On hand for the debauchery were cochairs Lynn Dale and Frank Wisneski, opera stalwarts Steve and Jane Akin, music-lovers Suki and Miguel de Braganca (sporting a laurel wreath), red-headed siren Doreen Corkin squired by the handsome Chris Mitchum (a dead ringer for his movie-star father, Robert), bubbly blonde fashion plate Jill Goldweitz and the dashing Mo Levitt, party pair Susan and Bill Poduska with his son, John, and daughter-in-law, Heather, and the rest of the Boston crème de la cream pie.

Guests were treated to musical interludes ranging from opera to a breathy Marilyn Monroe impersonation, and the evening raised coffers of gold for young performers, which led one speaker to remark on how wonderful the "emerging artists program" is. "That all depends," whispered one guest, "on exactly what's emerging and from where." ×××

CORRECTION

In the Sept. 22, 2010 dining review, Carlos Gomez, not Marco Suarez, was the chef at Ledge Kitchen & Drinks.

Happily Ever After

The beautiful woman on the cover of this magazine has a story that warmed the cockles of my iced, straight-up-with-a-twist heart. In the summer of 2007, Jessica Doyle met a young state trooper named Brendan. Everything went swimmingly until, three weeks later, he suffered a severe brain injury and fell into a coma. Despite their short acquaintance, Jessica stayed at his bedside, and, despite the fact that the universe has the sensibility of a medieval headsman, Brendan eventually woke up. With Jessica's help, he spent a grueling year learning to use his body again. This past August they married, and lived happily ever after.

Or so I hope. But it's only been two months since their wedding, and you'd have to be a lurching imbecile, or a swan, to believe that a lifetime of commitment is easy. In marriage, there are days when you'd rather face something unholy that's risen from a Nazi black-magic ritual than deal with the emotional complexity of human relationships. There are moments when the future looks as rosy as if it's fallen down a 40-foot well. But lots of difficult things are worthwhile, like love, or surgically grafting titanium onto your bones. The keys to a successful marriage, I've been told, are sexual obsession and healthy credit. Both are subtexts in most weddings, too. That in mind, in this issue Ezra shows us how to give a wedding speech that doesn't make the happy couple tear off their ears in embarrassment. Vive l'amour.

Mesh Made in Heaven

NOTHING BUT NET

MILLINERY is an underappreciated craft, except in the horse-racing set and among brides. Irish milliner Marie Galvin caters to both from her South End showroom, where she handcrafts headwear for local ladies and Hollywood celebrities alike. Galvin learned her trade by studying old texts and deconstructing antique hats, but many of her pieces defy tradition and gravity. Others, like the one pictured, are classical beauties. ANDREW RIMAS

Am I being selfish if I don't listen to my mother-in-law's ideas on wedding planning?

ASK THE EXPERT

Gloria Spitalny

COUPLES COUNSELOR AND LICENSED PSYCHOLOGIST AT BACK BAY COUNSELING.

A: It's best if the bride and groom discuss and decide together all aspects of the wedding with the key idea being compromise and taking everyone's needs into consideration. Then the couple can present the plan to both families. If your mother-in-law continues to press for what she wants, your fiancé will have to communicate: "We appreciate your input and have decided to move forward as we have planned. We hope that you can be supportive of our wishes." [Your relationship with your mother-in-law] is important, so be flexible and attempt to build it based on admiration and mutual respect. Ultimately, it will depend on how she treats you. She would be wise to be loving, generous and make you feel welcomed into their family.

Dairy Tale

Just as autumn hits its stride, Pinkberry's first Boston outpost has hit the ground (Newbury Street, specifically—and predictably). Tawny swirls of seasonal pumpkin fro-yo accompany other flavors like pomegranate, chocolate and coconut, while the fixin's bar boasts toppings like fresh-cut fruit and mochi drops. Obsessive fans should note rumors of a possible Harvard Square store opening in the coming months.

Going Out

The Road Less Traveled

In a city where visibility often equals success, Journeyman takes an original approach. Tucked in a Union Square alley, the restaurant's only sign is a waist-high stamped post. "It's not the kind of place that many people will just wander into," says Meg Grady-Troia, co-owner with chefs (and married couple) Diana Kudayarova and Tse Wei Lim. "But that's OK."

JOURNEYMAN

The original concept was to serve a prix-fixe tasting ($39 for three courses, $65 for five), but there are occasional à la carte options. "We wanted it to be experience-oriented, where what you eat is an adventure," Grady-Troia says. Tables require reservations, and are seated only once per night to encourage patrons to stick around. Walk-ins can dine at a makeshift chef's table overlooking the kitchen.

The menu sees a complete overhaul weekly, and descriptions are intentionally vague. "Our menu is a guideline, and we hope that people will trust and understand as they taste," Grady-Troia says. A dessert, listed as "Apple: Cinnamon, Smoke," pairs sorbet, dotted with fresh and candied apple and topped with a house-made graham cracker and cinnamon marshmallow, with a smoked-cream panna cotta and apple-butterscotch sauce.

"Everything here is about taking the elements of home and stripping them down," she says. Set in the old Scarpetta pasta-sauce factory, the dining room feels both industrial and warm, with cinderblock walls contrasted by a chevron of reclaimed wood. A tall, vertical greenhouse grows herbs and heirloom vegetables. Other produce is sourced from the Union Square Farmers' Market when in season, resulting in plenty of in-house preserves.

Making your way here isn't easy, but then it feels like you've arrived home. "There isn't any thinking because we've done the thinking for you. It's relaxing," Grady-Troia adds. "We've had a lot of repeat diners who love that."

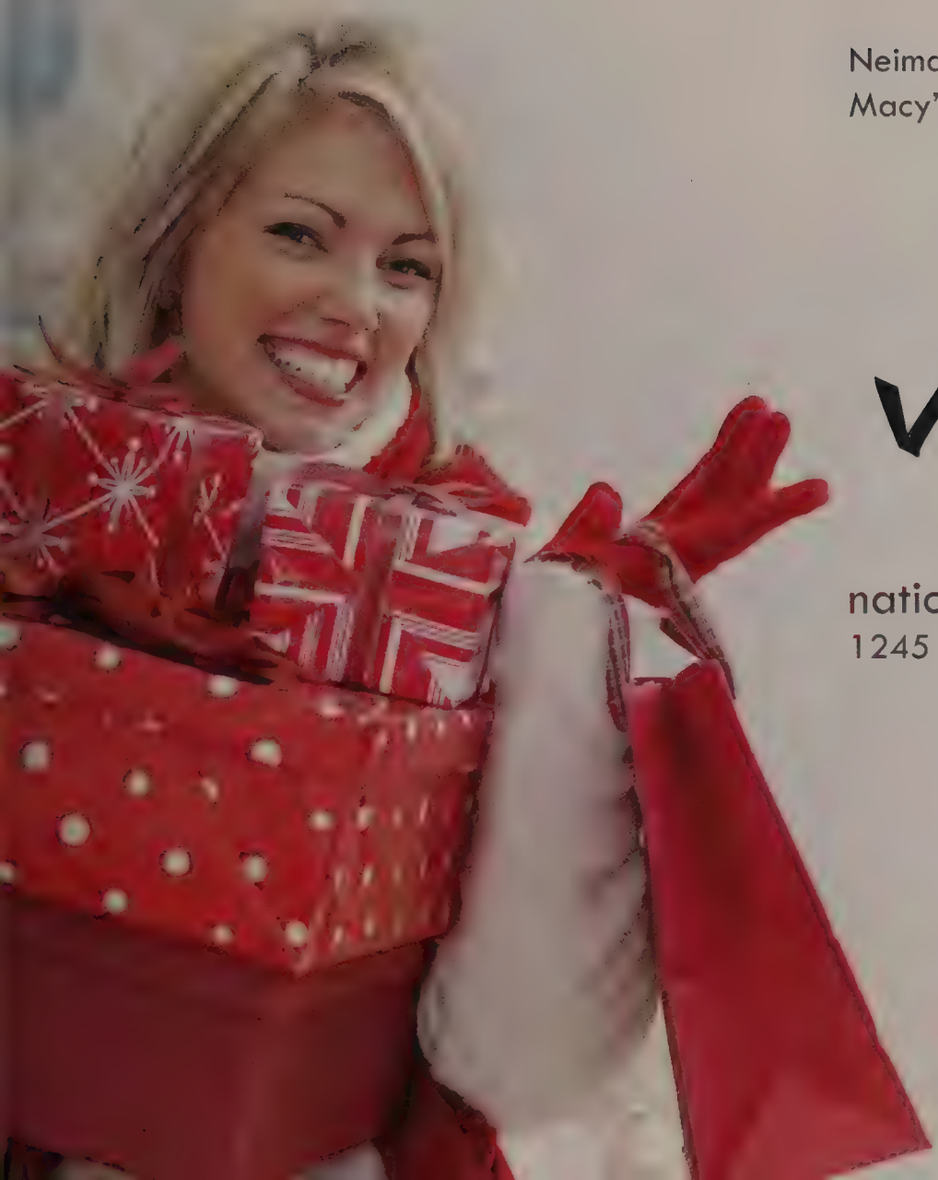
Pigalle goes democratic by broadening its bar scene

AS PIGALLE MARKS ITS 10TH anniversary, chef/owner Marc Orfaly is celebrating a decade in the Theatre District and planning to raise the bar for the future. By March, a new expanded bar—dubbed MarcBar—and menu will be in place, giving the people what they want. And what they want, says Orfaly, are "more options: Kobe-beef-and-foie-gras dumplings, shrimp rangoon, lobster shumai," along with the current bar bites such as oysters and terrines.

BARS ATTACKS
Marc Orfaly

Meanwhile, Orfaly plans to run a few classic Pigalle dishes on the menu every weekend for the rest of the year: poached cod with glazed salsify, Thai lobster, veal blanquette, cassoulet. All dishes that "people come back for," he says.

THIRTY TABLES AND COUNTING: Ten Tables (Jamaica Plain and Cambridge) proprietor Krista Kranyak plans to open her third restaurant next spring, this time in Provincetown. Although the main dining room will have just 10 tables (and a fireplace), the location will boast 100 seats throughout the bar, lounge and patio areas. Called Ten Tables Restaurant & Bar, the seasonally open venue will feature the same focus on locally sourced ingredients, along with a familiar face—general manager Matthew Lishansky, most recently of Del Posto in Manhattan and former GM at UpStairs on the Square.



REGINA AT THE DEPOT: Regina Pizzeria has opened at the former Sports Depot. Floating Rock, whose Cambodian cuisine drew fans to its Revere location, should be open in Central Square by late November. And Canary Square, from the same folks who brought you Coda in the South End and Common Ground in Allston, has opened its doors in Hyde Square in Jamaica Plain.

A Family Thing

For years, lobsterman Mark Sewall has supplied his cousin Jeremy's restaurant Lineage with York Harbor crustaceans. Orders skyrocketed, though, when Jeremy Sewall and partners reinvented the old Great Bay space into Island Creek Oyster Bar—a serious (and sorely needed) seafood establishment. Among the most decadent offerings on the menu: an inspired surf and turf of ocher-tinted lobster-roe fettuccine crowned with grilled tail and claw meat, braised short ribs, and charred Brussels sprouts and chanterelles. ELIZABETH BOMZE

Wine

BUBBLE, BUBBLE

If my recent blind tastings are any indication, there's never been a better time to buy Champagne. When the world economy's shaky and demand falters, producers hold it back from release a little longer and add a higher proportion of older "reserve" wines to enrich their blends. The following outstanding bottles should be enjoyed with food, as in France.

Gosset Brut "Excellence" NV ($40, Brix). An absolute stunner. With buttery fresh-bread aromas accented by hints of lemon and lime, it features silky midpalate textures and a long toasty finish. Balance, understatement, finesse: Pick any cliché you want—it's a beautifully rich wine with a long chardonnay aftertaste that suggests thrilling partnership with seafood.

Ayala Brut "Majeur" NV ($53, The Wine Emporium). This obscure "designer Champagne" has an intriguing black cherry, almond, slightly smoky pinot-dominated aroma. On the palate, it's very dry and lemony with a crisp mineral chalkiness and long tangy finish. Serve it with richer seafood steaks, such as tuna or salmon.

Taittinger Brut "La Française" NV ($55, The Wine Emporium). One of the great family-owned Champagne houses never disappoints with its flagship wine, an herb-and-brioche-scented medium-weight bubbly with creamy flavors. La Française has good intensity, vanilla, citrus and toast nuances and a persistent core of acidity. It tastes magical with raw shellfish.

Laurent-Perrier Brut NV ($45, Bauer Wine). Subtle and sleek, Laurent-Perrier has a lush cookie-dough aroma featuring sweet herbs and baking spices. It's very soft and mellow but with lively crisp fruit on the finish. For an all-purpose Champagne, you can't find better. Just don't drink it out of the bottle (in public).

Drink of the Moment

The Highest Form of Flattery

On Aaron Butler's 21st birthday, he took a seat at the Capital Grille and was asked what he wanted for his first legal drink. "I couldn't think of anything, so I just said, 'A Manhattan,'" he recalls. "And so began my love affair that continues to this day."

At 30, the Russell House Tavern bar manager now has his own version. As Butler explains, "People make variations of the Manhattan and name them after places." For example, his former employer, Drink, mixes rye with Punt e Mes and Benedictine for a cocktail called the Fort Point. In honor of his new station, Butler mixes rye, Dubonnet Rouge and Benedictine for a concoction he calls HARVARD YARD ($9).

A touch sweeter than the classic, the cocktail's sugar is cropped by the spicy, bitter finish of allspice dram—an ingredient normally found in tiki drinks. The counterbalanced blend helps the Harvard Yard become what Butler describes as "a gateway drink." He suggests, "After this, I'd take someone to the Vieux Carré, then after that to something like the Seelbach." All on the menu, and taken together, these three offshoots of the Manhattan are a tutorial in cocktail history (and rough mornings). Separately, they're all fine suggestions for the next time you're struck dumb at the bar. NICK ALTSCHULLER

Impersonals FRIENDS TO THE END

TO THE "FRIEND" WHO ENDED OUR FRIENDSHIP VIA E-MAIL:
You're really just an unattractive person who's immature, wrongfully taking your anger out on other people. You cut ties with me on the advice of a whack job you thought was a real friend. Turns out, they were just using you, and now you've lost us both. The new group you're hanging out with is a pretty sad cover-up for the fact that you have no life and no real friends. Everyone can see through your pathetic Facebook statuses. Your inflated ego only points to a low self-image. Who will you blame next? Anonymous

To the driver of the SUV that hit-and-ran:

I thought my grandmother having to go to the hospital and getting a bad grade on a bio midterm was bad enough, but you proved me wrong. Silly me to assume that you'd actually be turning in the direction of your blinker, and not into the side of my car! Next time you hit someone, I hope you put your big boy or girl pants on and take responsibility for your awful driving. Instead, you made an illegal turn onto Mass. Ave. Those of us who don't like paying for damage caused by cowardly drivers like you would appreciate it. Driver of the now-damaged blue Sentra

To the heckler at Toad:

Everyone was really enjoying the Sarah Borges concert on Oct. 9, until you drowned out the music with your weird catcalls and inappropriate remarks. Your pathetic demands for attention reveal just how insecure and obnoxious you actually are. The next time you decide to act like a monkey's bunghole in public, stay home and screw the hole you drilled in your couch instead. N.M.

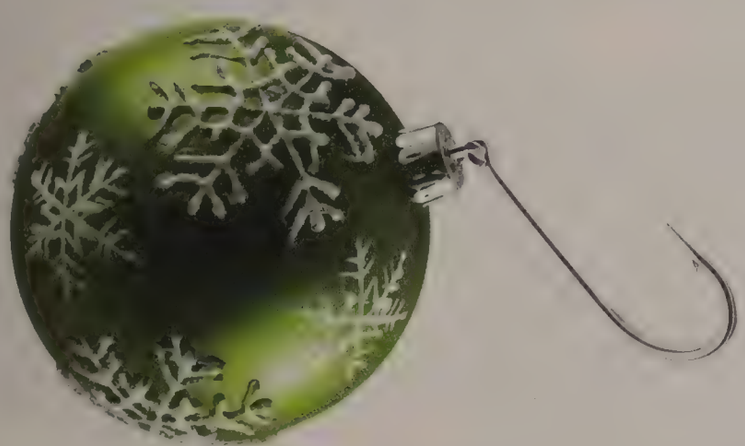
IT'S THE REAL (BAD) THING

The dark side of an American icon

BEHIND COCA-COLA'S Valentine-red can's logo and underneath its sunny image lies a dark and dangerous story. In our evermore obese America, Coke has infiltrated classrooms, striking a devil's bargain whereby schools have received up to $30,000 in exchange for placing those enticing red machines where young children can fatten up between classes (putting the "C" for Coke into their ABCs). With its long lifespan, Coke—perhaps originally containing lower-case coke—was "born" in 1886. It soon poured across the globe while keeping a large share of the international profits in pockets back home. The company now spends about $3 billion annually on advertising.

The Coke Machine: The Dirty Truth Behind the World's Favorite Soft Drink
by Michael Blanding



Blanding lives in Jamaica Plain.

As well as investigating how Coke fought unions and colluded in violence in Colombia, Boston journalist Michael Blanding shows how India's people suffered environmental horrors as Coke depleted local water supplies, then gave the gift of solid-waste fertilizer polluted by cadmium to farmers whose animals subsequently died. Meanwhile, ads chirped about teaching the world to sing.

This elegantly-written, fact-packed exposé elaborates the extreme tension between unions, radical college students, disturbed activists, terrified parents and Coke, with its official posture of innocence—and unofficial one of hostile detachment. ***

FROM PAGE 181: "Manco turns serious again. 'No, we do not drink Coca-Cola. Coca-Cola is death,' he says. In the early days of the Coca-Cola Company, when a worker was particularly enthusiastic and loyal to the company, it was said he had 'syrup in his veins.' Manco turns that exactly on its head: 'Drinking Coca-Cola is like drinking the blood of the workers.'"

NEW BEGINNINGS

Chef Tiffani Faison takes over the Rocca kitchen and crafts some winning combinations.

HIGH BRAISE Smoked and braised pork, and seats at the upstairs bar.

OPENED IN 2007 AS A celebration of the Mediterranean cuisine of Liguria, Michela Larson's Rocca helped solidify the SoWa neighborhood's growing reputation as a dining destination. But my visit early this year found Rocca floundering, its food mediocre, and the atmosphere downcast, almost sullen. Enter Tiffani Faison, a young energetic chef who has created a livelier, more palate-pleasing venue.

At Rocca, nature meets artistry. Soil touches sea. The Ligurian focus has been expanded to encompass all of coastal Italy, and its approach uses informed aesthetic instincts to identify and present first-rate ingredients. Then, Italian tradition requires the chef to get out of the way of their flavors and textures.

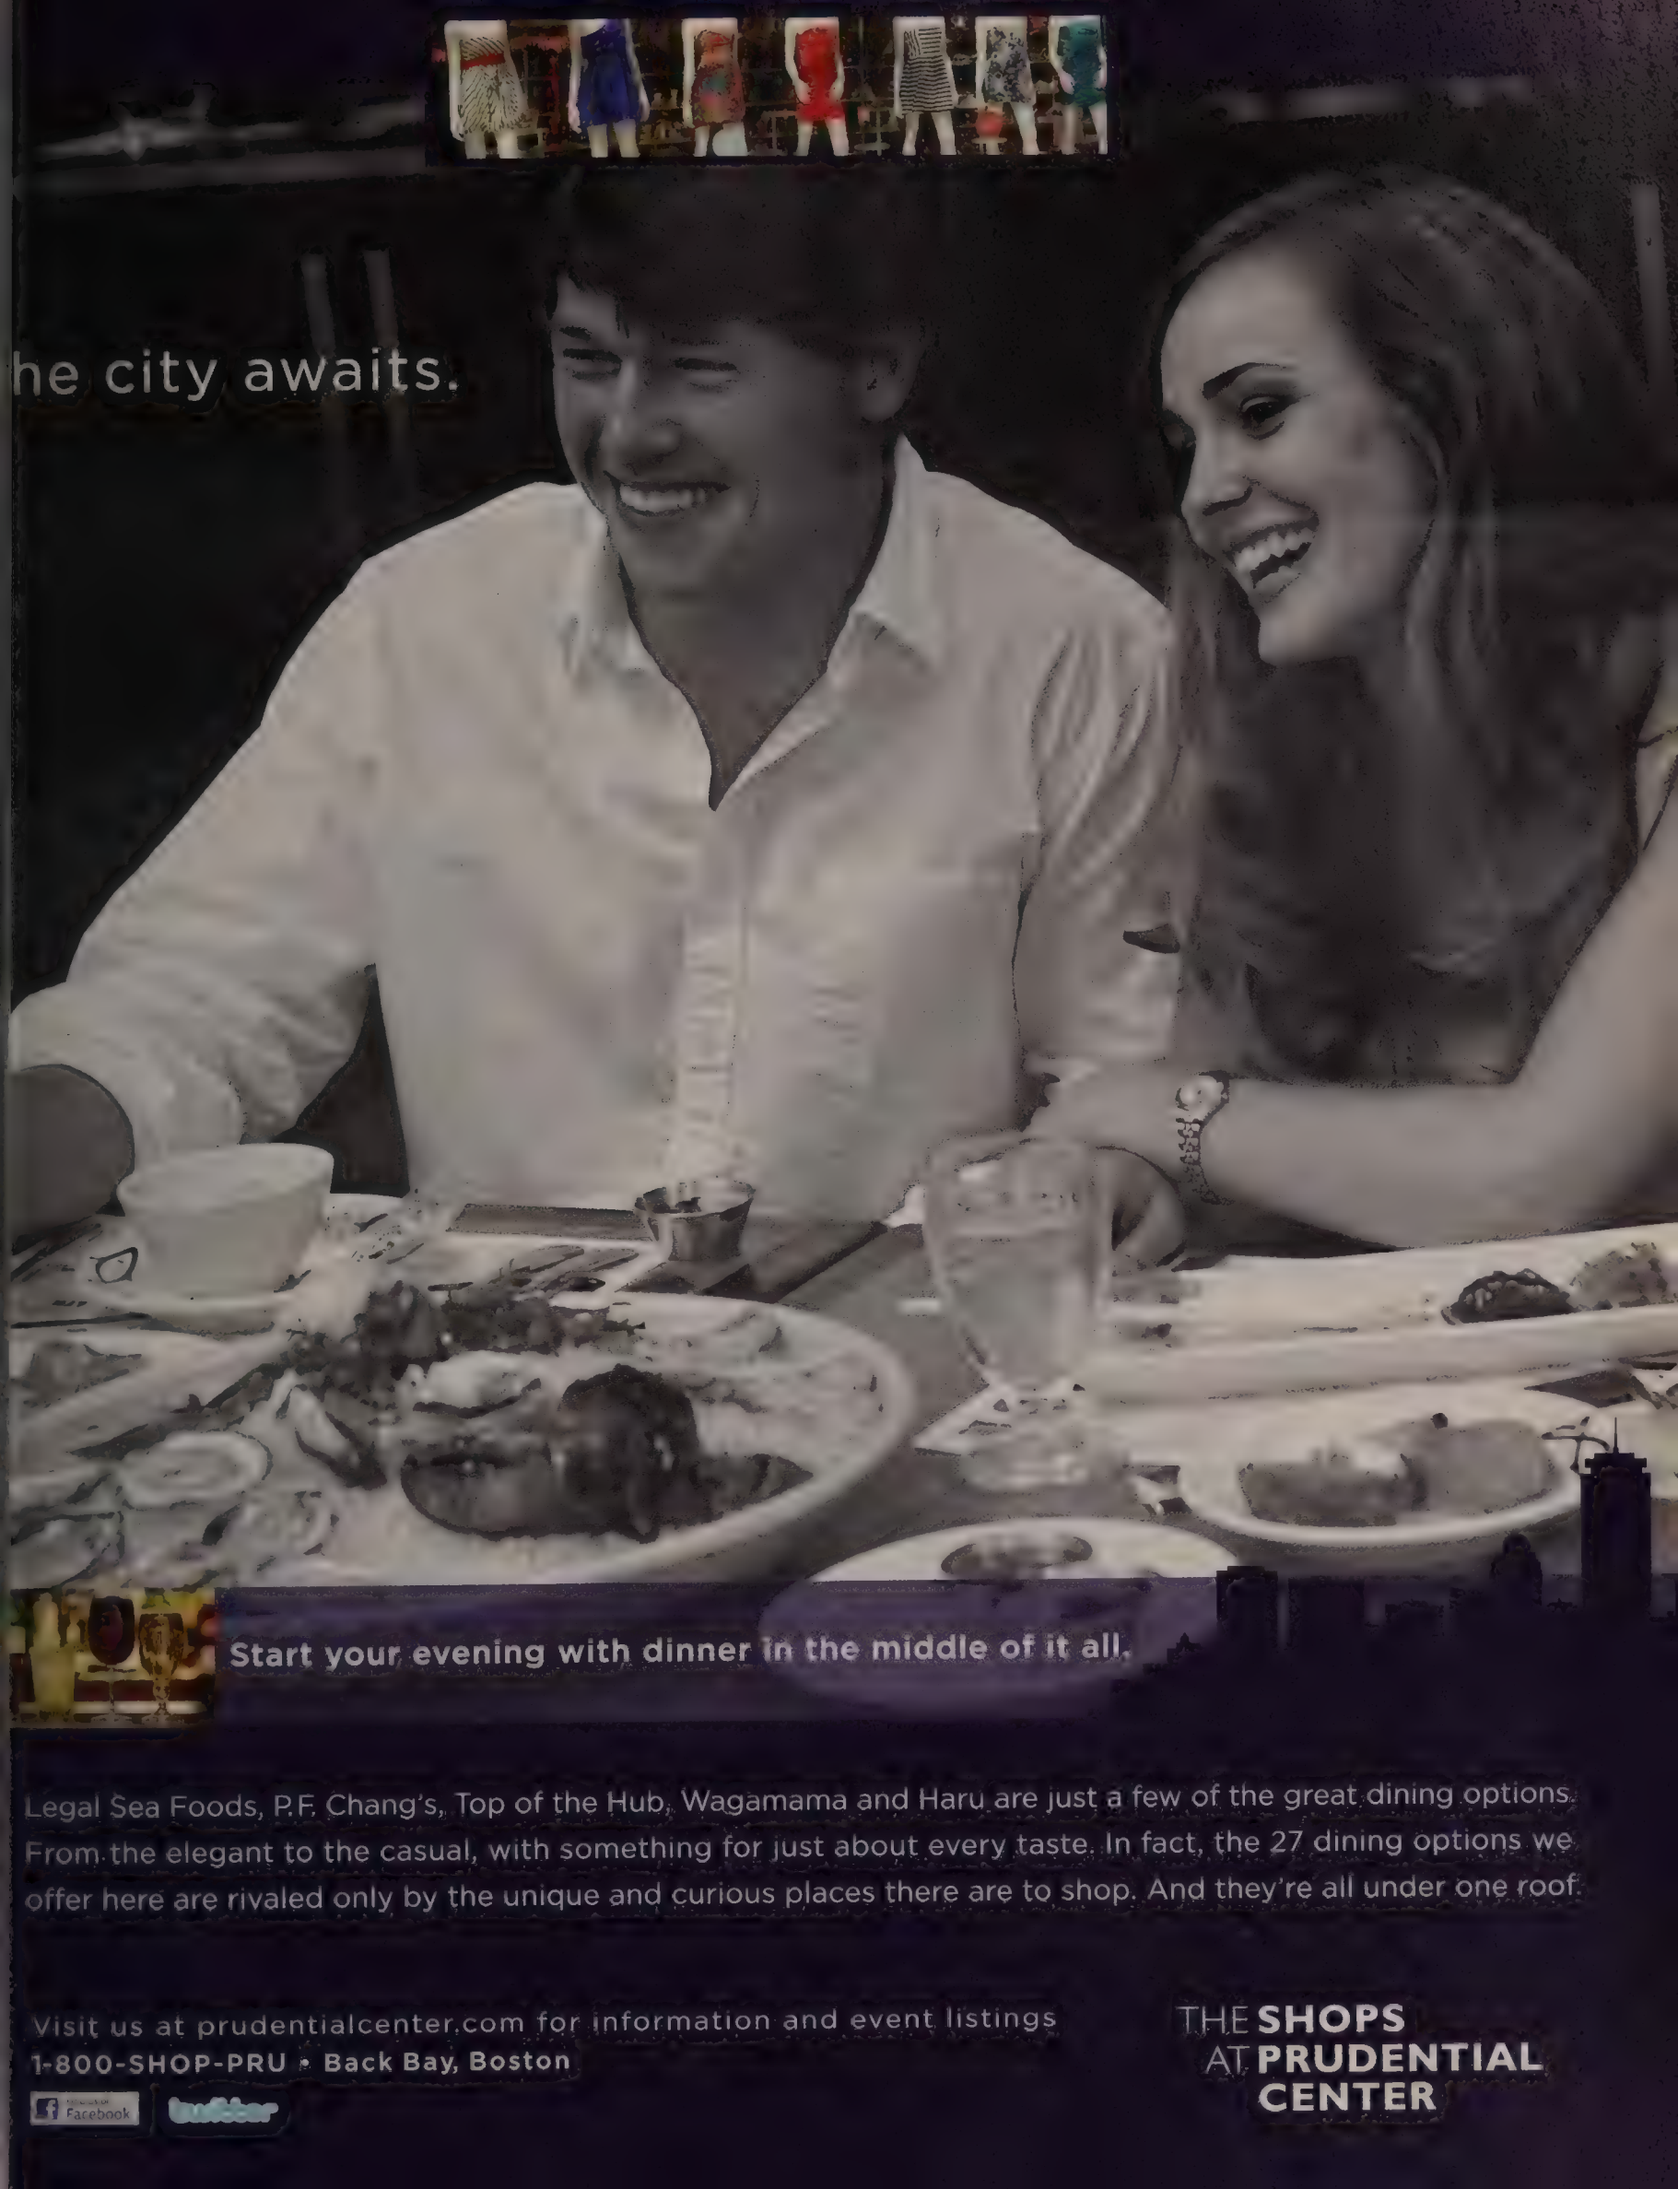
The appetizers included a Cape scallop ceviche ($10), consisting of four thin slices of a single scallop enlivened with a sliver of grapefruit, chives, olive oil and a mild horseradish foam. I was skeptical of the foam, until a taste revealed that it marshaled the flavors of these divergent ingredients into a coherent ensemble. In total, the opener was laughably tiny but exquisite. Pat's clams ($8) featured full-flavored clam stock, celery, smoked potatoes and three clams. Both of these dishes were too good to serve in such teasingly scant portions, but the excellent ciabatta, baked in-house, and aromatic olive oil held our appetites at bay until reinforcements arrived, in the form of Rocca's exceptional pastas.

The strozzapretti neri ($14), fresh pasta hand-formed into firm but tender worm-sized noodles, came dressed in an inky sauce of escarole pesto, spicy caviar and a half-dozen plump shrimp. Al dente sheets of lasagna ($13) had been layered in a cast-iron ramekin with olive misto, Pecorino cheese and tripe, with a well-balanced tomato sauce domesticating the assertiveness of the offal and creating a most harmonious dish. Finally, lobster gnocchetti ($19) combined small feathery-light pasta pillows, chunks of charred lobster, nuggets of guanciale and sea urchin foam into an extraordinary treat, the foam again making the dish greater than just a sum of its parts.

Main courses, for the most part, maintained the high standards of what preceded them. Roasted organic chicken ($23), a menu offering I usually regard as a test of how well the kitchen executes the basics, was moist, flavorful and arrived with a marvelous array of garnishes, including braised leeks and sautéed chanterelles, a mushroom made in heaven. Even more memorable, the smoked and braised pork ($27) combined the delightful texture of pulled pork with the crispiness of a deep-fried crackling wrapped around a substantial slab of pure, porcine goodness. Spiced spaghetti squash and butternut squash agrodolce demonstrated the compatibility of these sturdy starches with the rich shoulder meat.

Were the story to end here, Rocca would be a restaurant worth a detour. What makes it worth a journey were the dishes listed under "vegetables, leaves and grain," a selection of small plates that would turn the head of the most hardened meat-and-potato stalwart. Whether cold, like the cauliflower with prosciutto, golden raisins and pine nuts ($8), or hot, like the tiny fried artichokes with garlic, mint and lemon ($10), these preparations were exceptional and would make perfect appetizers.

Charles' Picks



Pat's clams

Lobster gnocchetti

Smoked and braised pork

Butterscotch budino

Desserts, including a velvety vanilla panna cotta ($6) and a voluptuous butterscotch budino ($8), did justice to what preceded them. Leaving aside the elevated price points, Rocca's beverage selection contained fine choices. We enjoyed a luscious 2005 Cannonau Riserva ($38) from Sardinia, and found a light Stefano Farina Barbera d'Asti ($33) satisfactory. Service ranged from inexperienced but exuberant to polished and professional. However, I was dismayed to encounter one of my service pet peeves: An overly eager waiter cleared the plates of some tablemates while others were still dining—a practice that says to the former, "You gobbled down your food too fast," and to the latter, "You're holding up the works." With these flavor combinations, the instincts to devour or savor should be equally encouraged. ✖✖✖

Legal Sea Foods, P.F. Chang's, Top of the Hub, Wagamama and Haru are just a few of the great dining options. From the elegant to the casual, with something for just about every taste. REST STOPPED

A lament on beds and babies

I HATE MY BED. Two years ago, we bought a new bed, and ever since my spine has been slowly forming into the shape of a question mark, as if to ask, "Why did you buy such a bad mattress?" It felt comfortable at the furniture store, but soon after we got home, I realized that the Scoliosis-o-pedic and I were never gonna get along. The problem: It's too soft. Despite being labeled "Euro Firm," this quivering bag of Slinkys is as firm as Kirstie Alley's resolve. On each side of the bed, our bodies have formed sunken depressions like shallow graves, the stuffing of the mattress having somehow migrated to the middle, creating a sheer outcropping between us. I'm considering the construction of a tunnel or canal so as to facilitate trade and communication across this daunting escarpment.

Normally, you'd smooth things out by flipping your mattress. But I made the mistake of buying a pillow top, which is unflippable. One side is the pillow, and the other side is rusty nails. So once your body compresses the top into Sleepless Hollow, there's nothing you can do. I sleep on my back every night, because turning on my side forces my body into a U shape, and I awaken with my head cocked to the side like a dog that just heard the words, "Who's that? Who's there?"

The upshot is I don't have bedbugs. I brought some back from a trip, but they tried my mattress and decided to drown themselves in the toilet instead. I've considered it myself.

I mention all this by way of explaining that I don't get the best night's sleep, even under ideal circumstances. And these are not ideal circumstances.

I haven't slept through the night in four months. Actually, that's not accurate. I had a few solid nights at one point—I was on a business trip. A beautiful, beautiful business trip. Now I'm on the verge of telling Heather that I have some important assignment and just booking myself into the nearest Marriott for a few nights. The culprit, if you haven't guessed, is the baby. I'm ready to join the Tea Partiers in demanding my country back, but just specifically the part where fathers didn't have to do anything except drink Scotch and be aloof. I'm pretty sure that the average man couldn't recognize the sound of a crying baby prior to 1973. He'd say, "Honey, go look under the eaves. It sounds like we've got a raccoon trapped up there." Them's were the days.

> The average man couldn't recognize the sound of a crying baby prior to 1973.

I've traditionally been able to wake up at night, motor around in a state of borderline somnambulism, then return to bed and slide right back to REM sleep. Thanks to the Iron Maiden mattress, I've discovered that if I stay awake for 15 minutes I may as well go out and do some midnight street racing, because I'm not falling back asleep.

I lie there, trying to relax, but my brain begins mulling topics of great importance. Why do people repeat a word three times for emphasis? I hate, hate, hate that. Why, when male comedians imitate women, do they always talk with a lisp? I don't think I know any woman who has a lisp, and yet, in the world of male comedians, every woman sounds like a falsetto Sylvester the Cat. Thufferin' thuccotash! And what the hell is succotash? It sounds like either some kind of disgusting food or an industrial byproduct. Either way, catchphrases involving ancient foodstuffs and/or aluminum smelting underscore how outdated Looney Tunes were, even back in the '80s. Well, that and the casual racism.

And on it goes like this, until the sun comes up, and I arise like a sunken-eyed creature of the underworld, set loose to torment and affront all whom I encounter. I'm like the McDonald's "Don't Talk to Me" coffee guy, except that instead of saying "Ugg! Durrr!" when people ask me a question, I just go straight into a violent outburst.

I'm not sure what the solution is. A new mattress would help, but that's only half the equation. I've written about how I'm against medicating children, since we generally seem to have decided that behavior once thought of as "being a kid" is now aberrant and treatable with drugs. Well, a person's entitled to change his mind. If I can't return to the laissez-faire fatherhood role of the Mad Men days, I'll settle for some Flintstones Ambien. ✖✖✖

MEN OF INFLUENCE

Encounters with my personal heroes

THERE ARE PEOPLE WHO have inspired me, nurtured me and taught me much about money, business and everything else. So I thought I'd share a few stories about two famous men who brushed my life when I was at my most vulnerable.

The first is about Ernest Hemingway. For most of us, our most vulnerable age is when we're about to burst into the adult world, full of dreams and misconceptions. All I wanted to do at that time was to sit in Parisian cafes with a notebook and a drink, and become the Great American Novelist. In the summer of 1959, I went to Pamplona, Spain, running with the bulls and searching for my own Lady Brett. Hemingway was also there, on his last visit. The Sun Also Rises was one of the three novels that most influenced me early in life.

Hemingway was traveling from corrida to corrida that summer, tracking a bullfighting competition between two matadors: Dominguín, the veteran, and Ordóñez, the young challenger. They were engaged in a series of shootouts, mano a mano, pursuing ears and tails. I knew that if I could get close to Papa, even for a few minutes, I could coax out of him the secret to literary fame and fortune. Problem was, he was constantly surrounded by an entourage that a friend described as "various picadors, reporters, suck-ups and Smith College English majors."

I tracked the great man for three days looking for an opening, three days of running the bulls, enduring what seemed like a year's pressing of grapes squeezed into my mouth, my eyes, my ears, my shoes, my shirt, from hundreds of wineskins. I cruised the plazas. I slept in the backseat of a Simca, a car as unreliable as a weather prediction. I slept little, drank a lot and sat in the sun wondering about the people who could afford beds.

Then one night, at about 10:30, I spied Hemingway exiting a cafe and heading for dinner. He rolled when he walked, swaggering like a high-school football player. He moved away from his entourage, gesturing for them to wait while he detoured down a side street. I followed and came upon him urinating next to a fountain off the main plaza. I stepped up to Papa and unzipped.

"Mind if I whiz next to you?" I asked.

Hemingway looked at me. "Whiz is what women do," he said. "Men piss."

"I actually want to write," I told him, "not whiz."

He snorted at me. "Let me tell you something, kid," he said. "Don't talk about what you want to do. Do it. Run with the bulls. Watch the horns, like a fighter—feint, punch, feint, punch. Have a good leak, kid. Men also call a piss a leak. But whatever you call it, it's easier to do than writing."

The next afternoon, the sun was so strong it made you feel as if you were looking at a mirage. I was sitting with two friends outside the bullring. They were drunk. Everyone in Pamplona was drunk. But my friends were the only ones in Pamplona getting their sneakers shined by three different shoeshine boys. In three different colors. Hemingway walked by, surrounded by a crowd of college students, Spanish companions and other keepers of the flame.

"There's the Whizzer," he called to me, making his hangers-on jealous. "You have your tickets?"

"In the sun," I said.

"Watch how they feint," he said. "Watch how they feint, Whizzer." His entourage swept him along into the corrida.

When I got out of college, starting lawyers were paid around $6,000. Naturally, I would meet people then who invited envy. They were success stories, early heroes who made is young bloods wonder if we'd ever make it n life. One of these was the center fielder of he Red Sox in the early 1960s, Gary Geiger. He was my roommate in the Army Medical Corps at Fort Sam Houston, Texas. There was a draft in effect, so a lot of major league ballplayers enlisted in the reserves for six months active duty followed by several years of reserve training, once-a-month meetings and two-week drills in the summers. After basic training in the fall, ballplayers would join a unit in a specialty (like infantry or medical or intelligence). They all went to San Antonio in the winter to stay in shape, and get out in time for baseball season.

Geiger and I were squad leaders in Texas, sharing a small room. He came from Sand Ridge, Ill., a whippet-thin six-footer, built like an axe handle, with forearms like Popeye. He seldom smiled. And he gave off a look of intensity that said, "Do not mess with me." Most of the troops gave him a wide berth, which was just fine with Geiger.

In our room, the first night we were alone together, he said, "I'm a big league baseball player. I'm not drinking or smoking, and I don't have time or interest in doing anything but playing ball." Then he winked at me, "I'm in my 20s and I make $15,000 a year; I'm in a cocoon. When I'm marching, shooting the M-1, in the chow line, I'm thinking about baseball. If you ever want to really make it in life… you have to be pure." He meant intense.

"Wow," I thought. "Life is too complex to be pure." Then I thought, "I'll never make $15,000 a year."

I spent a lot of time with Geiger. He brought me off base to Trinity College in San Antonio where I threw batting practice to several of the other major leaguers in the Medical Corps. My hardest pitches were like lobs to them.

"I think I'd hit 1,000 if you pitched to me every day," Geiger said. Other than these practice jaunts, Gary Geiger would never go on road trips to Mexico or even Saturday nights to town.

"Mr. Yawkey really likes me," he said, "because I'm pure and I can hit the baseball. I'm never gonna take the chance some cowboy hits me with a beer bottle in some pissant bar. I just want the checks to keep comin'."

Health issues did Geiger in eventually. He finished as a major leaguer with 77 home runs and 283 RBIs. He called me after retirement when he saw I had several books published.

"You were a lousy pitcher," he said, "but at least a piece of you was pure." I cherish that.

What did these adventures teach me, before I went off into the real job world? Two lessons will benefit you in your career. One: Be mindful of the absurdities in life and how often they'll occur. Two: Never take yourself too seriously. Almost every time I think I'm really smart, I get my tail handed to me. ✖✖✖

ON WELKER, PEYTON AND SHAQTIVITIES

5 CROSS-SPORT POLLINATIONS

Knees News You've heard it a million times: It takes a full season to recover from a serious knee injury. We saw it with KG, whose struggles last year are even more glaring compared to how fantastic he's been this season. Meanwhile, Wes Welker is still stuck in his post-op hangover. Sure, some of his problems are Randy-related, but all things being equal, he's not the same Welker—and won't be until next year. Good thing Belichick's manufactured Welker clones to fill every position.

Ten More Years! Looking back on the last 10 years, which Boston athlete would you say is most synonymous with his franchise? I guess it comes down to Tom Brady or Paul Pierce, but for me, it's not much of a contest. While Brady has certainly won more, and has had a more historic career with the Pats, Paul Pierce IS the Boston Celtics. The organization means everything to him. And I'm still not convinced Brady retires in New England.

1 ONE TOUGH BREAK

You're not supposed to worry about a kicker's health. At least not if you're a fan of the Patriots—who've had only two kickers since 1996. But with Stephen Gostkowski's trip to the IR, we now get a taste of life in the real world. Hold me. I'm scared.

IT'S NO REACH Paul Pierce

Slippery Slope Last spring, we saw Jacoby Ellsbury go down with what we thought was an only-somewhat-serious injury. Then we watched as it derailed his entire season. Sound familiar? Oh yeah, that's what happens to Fred Taylor every year! I know, Fred's "close" to coming back. But I'll keep the Champagne on ice until he makes it through two straight games.

Curse Busters I've mentioned this before, but I keep seeing similarities between this current core of Bruins and the early-2000s Red Sox—right before they got over the hump. Last season, the B's did what the Sox did in 2003. They hit absolute, Hasselhoff-drunk-on-the-kitchen-floor, rock bottom. And like the Sox in 2004, the Bruins have miraculously come back a better, more upbeat and optimistic team. George is getting excited!

Baby Boom Glen Davis and Clay Buchholz are operating on two different levels. Buchholz certainly has a much higher ceiling, but after three years of ups-and-downs, controversy, trade rumors and emotional unrest, this was the year we finally saw both guys find their way. Baby obviously has some work to do before we declare this season a success, but he's this year's breakout Celtics star.

2 NEW SHAQTIVITIES

Shaq on Ice... Forget Tuukka Time or Thomas Time. What would happen if Shaq threw on the pads and spent a game lying on his side in front of the Bruins goal? Would the net even be visible? Is there a rule against that? If not, step up to the plate, Mr. Jacobs. He'll only run you the minimum.

And Here's a Real Zany One... Four out of every five games for the rest of the year, Shaq plays 20 minutes, scores 10 points and grabs seven rebounds a night. Imagine that? Come on, Shaq. Everyone would love it. EVERYONE would be talking about it. You could even call yourself: The Big Basketball Player. Not too much of a stretch, right?

3 Sports Shams

Jeter's Glove I understand that Gold Gloves are often earned on reputation, and I respect that to a certain extent. But this Derek Jeter business has gone too far, especially since he was never THAT good, defensively, to begin with. It's like People putting Chevy Chase on their 2011 Sexiest Man Alive cover because he was decent-looking back in the '70s.

Chilly's Job Brad Childress has ruined the Minnesota Vikings. He's divided the locker room. He's alienated fans. He's the reason we're all still stuck with Favre! Yet, an overtime win over an awful Arizona team was enough to save his job? Hasn't Jerry Jones taught us anything?

Replays Run Ragged I support the NFL's crackdown on hits to the head—there's nothing worse than a player lying motionless on the field. But know what also sucks? Watching a ref stand motionless in a replay booth, and that's more prevalent these days than Tom Brady touchdown passes. I don't blame the coaches for throwing the flag. I blame the zebras for leaning too heavily on replays and not having the brains or guts to get it right the first time.

4 DATES TO WATCH

11/17: Expect No. 1 overall pick John Wall to come out guns blazing in his Garden debut. Or if he doesn't, Gilbert Arenas surely will.

11/18: Big Papi turns the Big 3-5, so you can understand why he's jonesing for one last, longer contract—and why the Sox are hesitant to fork one over.

11/21: Peyton Manning and the Colts invade Foxboro. Actually, it might just be Peyton. The rest of the team will be on the IR by now.

11/25: The Pats prepare for "Thanksgiving in Detroit," which is either the most depressing Hallmark movie of all time, or another potential Patriot trap game.

Soroff On ROB ORCHARD

Emerson College's arts honcho tells us about control freaks, stroking egos and the vital importance of ladies' rooms.

THEATER PRODUCER ROB ORCHARD, 63, is Emerson College's first executive director for the arts. A producer for more than 35 years, he began at the Yale Repertory Theater and spent 30 years at Harvard's American Repertory Theater before coming to Emerson in 2009. He has worked with Nobel Prize–winning playwrights and many of the world's leading directors and actors. Under his leadership, the A.R.T. earned a Pulitzer Prize, a Tony award and was named one of America's best theaters by Time magazine. In 2000, Orchard received the Elliot Norton Award for Sustained Excellence. He lives in Milton.

Jonathan Soroff: Are producers people who secretly want to direct or perform?
Rob Orchard: Producers are people who want to be in control.

Are they control freaks?
I classify myself as a sympathetic control freak.

Anyone you've worked with in the past whom you'd never work with again?
Lots. This is a collaborative business, and there are certain people who can work that way and certain people who can't.

Worst theater nightmare story?
The motto of the theater, of course, is the show must go on, and the worst nightmares relate to situations where the show can't go on.

What's your most memorable theater evening?
When I was a kid, I saw Death of a Salesman, and I didn't know the play. I was so absorbed by the story. When it ended, I felt like I'd been punched. I couldn't breathe. And I think I knew at that point that this was a world I wanted to be in.

Quality that makes you a good producer?
Juggling the sensitivity to the creative process and realizing you can't legislate it, while at the same time recognizing that deadlines are a reality.

What does Emerson have that Yale and Harvard don't?
Emerson is a college of arts and communications, so it has a much more specific focus on creativity. To be doing this kind of work at a college where creativity is its central goal is a huge change. Yale and Harvard are magnificent universities, but the arts are only a part of them, and rather tangential.

Most impressive thing about Emerson's theater program?
The way it's completely physically transformed itself. There is no other college in the country with these kinds of facilities.

If your life were a play, what would it be and why?
It'd probably come out of theater of the absurd, and there wouldn't be a couch or a kitchen in it.

Favorite playwright?
I tend to be drawn to playwrights who celebrate ambiguity. Writers who open up issues and do it in a way that celebrates their complexity. I like more abstract and impressionistic kinds of work.

Has Broadway been completely Disney-fied?
Not at all, but there's a huge difference [in comparison to] the not-for-profit theater world, where the purpose is to serve the art form. Broadway has a different purpose, which is to make money. Great works of art can still come from that.

What makes up the single biggest line-item in a production's budget?
Labor—from the people who build sets and costumes to the actors. It's a handcrafted industry. So it's 80 percent labor.

Are you good at penny-pinching?
I have to be, because you never have as many pennies as you need. It can result in solutions that are sometimes more creative and better suit the work. If you had infinite resources that doesn't mean the work will be better.

Worst mistake you've made?
Hiring the wrong people. I've done that lots of times.

Musicals or straight theater?
Either. The three things all good theater has are an emotional life to it, an intellectual life to it and a sense of entertainment.

Worst production you ever saw?
There are experiments all the time that fail, and I leave thinking, "That was really crappy." When a project has ambition but fails, you still have to appreciate what they're trying to do.

Pet peeve in the theater?
There's a kind of narcissism to it that gets tiresome after a while.

Are you ever starstruck?
All the time! If you're not starstruck, you're a cynic. You have to maintain that sense of wonder.

How do you deal with all the gargantuan egos?
You stroke them.

Most important thing in a theater itself?
Restrooms for women.

How many plays do you see in a year?
I counted recently. Between October and the summer, I saw 85.

Who has the richest theatrical heritage?
Of the ones I know, I'd say that in recent times, the Eastern European and Russian cultures have some of the most exciting theater. It really comes out of their experience under communism, where theater was important both before and during the communist period, even though theater was subject to censorship. They managed to send subversive signals to the audience that were sufficiently abstract that they didn't get into trouble.

How do you feel about critics?
They're absolutely essential. A healthy theater culture really doesn't exist without constructive criticism.

Last question: Can I star in my own one-man show at your theater?
Absolutely. But only if it's good. ×××

SPEECH THERAPY

The Improper's guide to giving a wedding speech without jumpstarting a divorce

BY EZRA DYER / ILLUSTRATION BY ROXIE VIZCARRA

<<<<<<<<<<<< >>>>>>>>>>>>

Unless you're a politician or the reincarnation of Dale Carnegie, your daily life probably doesn't have much occasion for speeches. For most of us, weddings are the first and only venue for public speaking. Which is why so many best man speeches go wildly off the tracks. Maybe you were the one who flubbed it, or maybe you were just in the audience, cringing, as a best man went on a lengthy exposition of the time the groom got crabs in Atlantic City—and not the Alaskan King kind. Wucka wucka! Either way, we can agree that best men do not always give the best speeches.

>>>>>>>>>>>> I'm here to help. <<<<<<<<<<<<

I'VE NEVER ACTUALLY BEEN A BEST MAN MYSELF.

Obviously, this is because all my friends are worried that my speech would be so awesome that it'd completely overshadow their nuptials. But I've spoken at weddings. One friend asked me to give a speech during his ceremony, which was a bit discomfiting when I noted that the bride and groom were the only couple I knew who could celebrate their 10th anniversary on their wedding day. I was going for a fun, "they finally got around to getting married" moment of levity, but when I looked out at the crowd I could see everyone doing the math. If they started dating 10 years ago, that would've made the bride… 15 years old. In retrospect, this maybe wasn't the best aspect of their relationship to highlight in church.

I also spoke at my friend Kara's reception. I told the story of the first time we had to work together on a project, in English class freshman year of high school. For the assignment, each person had to tell the other an anecdote from his or her life, which would then be used to construct a poster about that person. The idea was that we'd all get to know each other better. But Kara refused to tell me anything, insisting that nothing interesting had ever happened to her. I threatened that if she didn't give me an anecdote, I'd invent one for her. She said fine.

So when Kara's poster went up, it included a fanciful story about her house getting burgled—according to my poster, the thieves took everything except her camera and her toothbrush. She was at least glad to have the toothbrush, and used it for a week before deciding to get her film developed. And when she got the photos back, she discovered… pictures of the thieves sticking her toothbrush up their butts!

Great anecdote, I know. But perhaps not a great one to tell in front of the grandparents. I tried to bring the story back to the groom, Mike (whom I also knew in high school), but it's hard to steer things back around to the "Awwww!" moment once you've dropped the phrase "sticking her toothbrush up their butts." That's a hard-won lesson.

I've attended, by my count, 592 weddings in the past three years. So I've heard a few speeches. And, along the way, I've absorbed some ideas about what works and what doesn't. For example, the aforementioned "Awwww!" moment. You've got to get there. But first you must navigate the reefs that can wreck your speech. Let this be your chart.

STEP 1: Establish your bona fides.

At most weddings, you can expect that at least half of the people attending won't know you. Sure, they know you're the best man, but why is that? Were you the groom's college roommate? His former conjoined twin? Did you attend Top Gun Academy together? Your first priority is to establish yourself as the authority on the groom's life. You're the Ken Burns to his baseball, the Ken Burns to his Civil War or, to put it another way, the Ken Burns to his jazz. You're the foremost authority on this man.

Pop quiz: How much of the preceding story should make it into your speech? Answer: none of it, after the line about the sneeze. As best man, you need to manage information like a CIA press officer. But that's getting ahead of ourselves.

>>> ADDENDUM 1A: Remember, this isn't about you.

I know you don't get many chances to talk about yourself in front of an audience, but once you've introduced yourself and impressed the idea of your nonpareil significance, move on. This isn't your chance to bore everyone with your amateur stand-up material, or deliver a screed against the MSG industry. That's what Facebook is for.

Manage information like a CIA press officer.

Don't be afraid to exaggerate your knowledge of the groom, even resorting to cheap parlor trickery. You might say, "I know this guy so well, I can tell you that he has to sneeze right now." Of course, he'll sneeze just after you say that—and, indeed, throughout your speech—because you've sewn a bag of cat dander into his tuxedo jacket. He's allergic to cats, which you know from the time the two of you picked up those stray tabbies just so you could hit on that hot chick who volunteered at the animal shelter. Unfortunately, the plan didn't work, because you found out the hard way that cat scratch fever is not just a Ted Nugent song, and you ended up puking all over a one-eyed Pomeranian at the check-in desk.

STEP 2: Time for some anecdotes.

Make a list of the 10 funniest things that the groom has done. Then make a list of the 50 funniest things he's done. Now, take a look at everything that didn't qualify for that. Those will be the stories that might be fit for wedding consumption. It's a sad truism of best man speeches—the funniest stuff needs to be left unsaid, for everyone's sake. I'm not trying to be a prude, but there are solid reasons—perhaps even legal reasons—to avoid telling the really good stories in this setting.

or instance:

I have a friend who once got drunk and climbed into the wrong bed at the house where we were staying. In that bed already: a nun.

I have a friend who got so baked at a movie theater that he thought he was going to die, so he called 911 and had himself arrested.

I have a friend who burned down a cemetery and then had to do public service with the local firemen, who forced him to watch the movie Backdraft.

None of that is best-man-type material. Your anecdote should involve you and the groom getting into the kind of PG-rated shenanigans that will paint a picture of him as a loveable scamp, and not the sociopath that he might actually be.

If you're stuck for material, feel free to plagiarize scripts from '80s TV sitcoms. Tell the story about the hilarity that ensued when the groom snuck out of the bedroom while Mrs. Ochmonek was over babysitting and she decided to watch Psycho. Nobody will remember it was a plot from Alf.

>>> ADDENDUM 2A: Never mention the bachelor party.

Whether it was the wildest night you'll never remember or you went on a wine tasting and discussed masterpieces of classic literature, don't bring the bachelor party into your speech. If it was the former, nobody wants to hear about it, and if it was the latter, nobody will believe you anyway. As far as you're concerned, the bachelor party is a homicide that you witnessed, but you ain't snitchin'.

>>> ADDENDUM 2B: Remember, this is not a roast.

Maybe the groom has really stinky farts (in fact, he probably does).

Paint a picture of him as a loveable scamp, and not a sociopath.

Maybe his underwear looks like Daytona International Speedway after an 18-car pileup. Maybe it's gotten to the point that you think success has a restraining order on him (props to Jim Norton on that one). But try to stay positive, just this once. Remember, you have plenty of opportunities to denigrate his character on bathroom stalls, Dontdatehimgirl.com, and your Fantasy Football chat board.

STEP 3: Keep it tight.

How are we doing on time? If you've introduced yourself and told an anecdote, you should be five minutes in, max. If you've reached this point and you discover that you're clocking more than 10 minutes already, pull back the reins because you're dangerously long-winded. Remember, there's cake to cut and Electric Sliding to do. If you notice people at the back of the room sneaking off to the bar (or away from the wedding entirely), go to the two-minute drill. No-huddle, quick out patterns, save those T.O.s. If you're over 12 minutes, go straight to a haiku:

Jim and Felicia
They love each other a lot
Great couple, a toast!

STEP 4: Remember that the groom is only half of the equation.

This is probably the most common pitfall of a best man speech: The groom's character and accomplishments are lovingly detailed for 98 percent of the speech, at which point we learn that he met a great girl and she's cool and they lived happily ever after. Many best men seem unclear on whether they'd be able to identify the bride at the wedding itself, were she not wearing a distinctive white gown.

There are no hard and fast rules for this, but you need to devote at least 15 percent of the speech to the bride, specifically the salutary effect she's had on the groom. If you don't know her well, then good God, man, you're gonna have to make an effort. Even if you have one conversation prior to the event, make sure you learn a little about her character/background/physical appearance. If nothing else, the spirit of camaraderie established by your speech will help your fellow groomsmen later on with the bridesmaids.

STEP 5: Bring it back to the "Awwww!" moment.

This is the capper on any great best man speech. For the preceding components, a bit of an acid tone can work for you. You may even be able to reach into the Top 50 anecdotes (potentially opening up fun subject matter such as arrest records and public incontinence) provided you bring it back to the "Awwww!" moment. A successful "Awwww!" makes the speech. And what makes the "Awwww"? It has to relate to the bride. Whatever picture you painted of the groom, this is the part where you soften it up and show his humanity (if he has some). You need to specifically recount a moment when the bride did something to crack his steely demeanor or otherwise alter his worldview for the better. And it has to be sweeter than just, "None of us thought anyone could get him to wear condoms, until Lucile came along."

Cappers that can lead to "Awwws" may include, but are not limited to, the words "love," "soulmate," "forever," "grow old," and "best friend." But feel free to improvise. Bring out grandparents from both sides. Show a PowerPoint slide of kittens wrestling. Have the DJ cue Whitney Houston's "I Will Always Love You," while kittens wrestle and grandparents slow-dance. Be willing to show not only the groom's vulnerability, but your own.

And then, when there isn't a dry eye in the house and the guests are a wreck from the emotional rollercoaster on which you've taken them, that's when you raise the toast. To the bride, the groom, but really, to yourself. Because you've just made a kick-ass speech, my friend. Or at least, one that wasn't too painful. And cheers to that. ×××

UNEXPECTED WEDDING DESSERTS MAKE A SWEET CHANGE

BY KIM GIRARD & PHOTOGRAPHY BY BÉATRICE PELTRE

FRENCH MACAROONS

THE DANISH PASTRY HOUSE, 205 ARLINGTON ST., UNIT 4, WATERTOWN (617-926-2747); 330 BOSTON AVE., MEDFORD (781-396-8999); DANISHPASTRYHOUSE.COM

Ah, the fragile-but-lovely French macaroon. This two-bite, cotton-light confection is a perfect combination of crispy eggshell crunch with just the right pop of luscious buttercream in the center. "I can't help but eat a few every day," says Kathleen Flahive, co-owner of the Danish Pastry House. She offers the tiny, tricky-to-make treats in vanilla, pistachio or chocolate cream flavors, but will fire off raspberry or strawberry cream on request, or bake the shell in the brighter lavenders, pinks and yellows that dot many European bakery shelves.

TREAT CUPCAKE BAR, 1450 HIGHLAND AVE., NEEDHAM (781-444-4995) TREATCUPCAKEBAR.COM

For Adie Sprague, head baker/general manager of Treat Cupcake Bar, each wedding cupcake tower is an intricate art project. "Each cupcake has to be gorgeous—and they have to be gorgeous together," Sprague says. The final result is a tower that's more stunning than any single cupcake. While black and white are trendy, Sprague says lavender, burgundy and cream (pictured here with little bows on top to resemble wedding presents) and navy and pink are also popular with brides. The bottom line for Sprague is that the recipes powering the tower are as luscious as they look. "Taste is number one," she says. "It's your dessert!"

STRAWBERRY SHORTCAKES

PASSIONATE DISHES CATERING, BOSTON (617-899-7348) PASSIONATEDISHES.COM

When Terri Previte served strawberry shortcake at a wedding for the first time in the summer of 2009, the guests literally came running. "It was like ringing a bell," says Previte, owner/head chef of Boston-based Passionate Dishes, which specializes in catering outdoor weddings. "It was shocking—like out of a movie." Guests gobbled down her sugared homestyle biscuits loaded with organic, locally-sourced strawberries that had been soaked for 24 hours in Grand Marnier. Freshly whipped cream topped the treat. Previte admits that it's a simple dish, but says it's perfect in place of a cake for a clam bake or beach barbecue. The former MBA-turned-chef adds that her humble dessert is aligned with "a shift to more comfort food and economic backyard and beach weddings." And, if kids are present, she even pulls out noisy cans of whipped cream.

INDIVIDUAL DESSERTS

MODERN PASTRY, 257 HANOVER ST., BOSTON (617-523-3783); 20 SALEM ST., MEDFORD (781-396-3618); MODERNPASTRY.COM

Modern Pastry offers a convincing alternative to the multitiered cake. Consider the following knee-weakening treats: key-lime filling tucked into a crisp, buttery tart shell topped with a dollop of whipped cream and a citrus slice; a half-oval, dark-chocolate cup filled with whipped cream, sweet ricotta and vanilla custard, and studded with raspberries, blackberries and blueberries; and a rich, but surprisingly light, New York–style cheesecake smothered in ganache and topped with white- and dark-chocolate sticks. Some brides offer these sweets alongside traditional cake, says Lea St. Germain, the 78-year-old Italian bakery's general manager. With small desserts this gorgeous, who'd notice the main event?

CHOCOLATE SWANS

PARTY FAVORS, 1359 BEACON ST., BROOKLINE (617-566-3330) PARTYFAVORSBROOKLINE.COM

"Swans are coming back!" says John Pergantis, owner of Party Favors in Brookline. It's a fitting theme for a city famous for its fleet of swan boats. Pergantis designs this unique wedding dessert in monochrome: a white-chocolate swan filled with tropical-fruit mousse and surrounded by black-and-white cookies and chocolate-dipped strawberries—dressed up in edible tuxes and wedding pearls.

MINIATURE WHOOPIE PIES

BAKERS' BEST, 27 LINCOLN ST., NEWTON (617-332-4588) BAKERSBESTCATERING.COM

Downsizing this childhood dessert from hockey-puck-size to bite-size lets guests polish off a few and get back to business on the dance floor. Bakers' Best executive chef Phyllis Kaplowitz churns out many varieties of these perfect, petite ovals. There's carrot cake with cream-cheese filling, rich chocolate with a peanut-butter center, pumpkin cookie with a cider-syrup cream and a Christmas red velvet with peppermint filling. Kaplowitz, who'll be featured early next year on the Food Network show Chopped, can also match the whoopie to the wedding's red or concord-grape color scheme. "Everyone wants to go back to something that's familiar to them," she says. The key to making a perfect whoopie pie, she explains, is just the right cake-to-cream ratio. "You want something that's moist and has filling popping out of it so you don't get something that's dry."

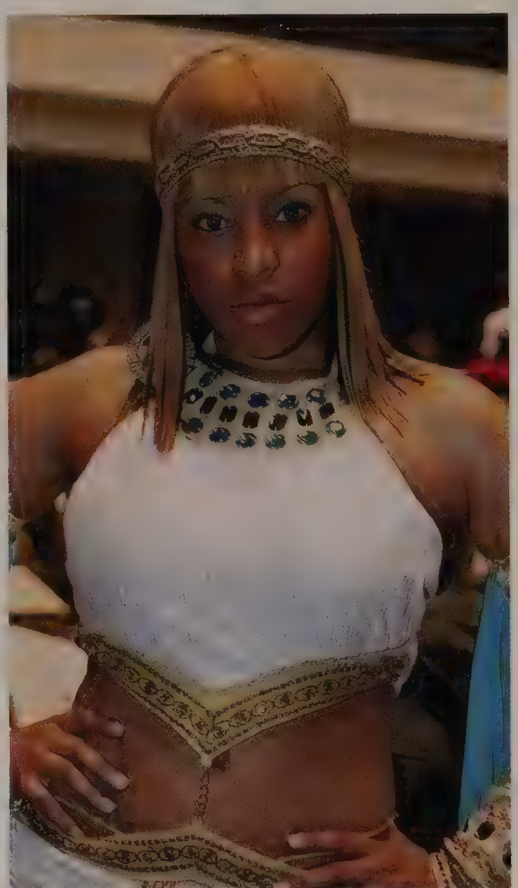
Art House

JUST WING IT



AFTER 10 YEARS OF architectural plans, fund-raising parties and pouring concrete, the MFA's new Art of the Americas wing is finally opening. Iconic works from Sargent, Copley and Homer hang from the walls of the sunny, four-story glass building that blends elegantly into the old Fenway structure. Along with the new square footage, the museum has expanded its collection to include works from North, South and Central America in every medium imaginable. In honor of the wing's grand opening, visitors receive free admission on Nov. 20.

Hair, Do

The Mane Event There's no shortage of salons in Boston, but sometimes it takes more than word of mouth to prove that a stylist is a cut above the rest. Hosted by hair guru Glynn Jackson, the "M" Awards Stylist and Barber Hair Show & Competition kicks off with a Battle of the Sexes on Nov. 21 at the Boston Marriott Copley Hotel. More than 40 stylists will compete for $10,000 in prizes and the opportunity to film a reality TV pilot, while models show off innovative and "unbeweavable" looks that are sure to turn heads. If the wild styles allow. Hayley Miller

Once upon a time, there lived a beautiful Boston bride in search of the picture-perfect place to celebrate her wedding festivities. Luckily, a new restaurant located in the heart of Boston caught her eye. Seating up to 300 guests and featuring multiple private dining rooms, she knew Petit Robert Central was the superb spot to host her party. The fact that the dazzlingly delicious (and totally customizable) menu was created by award-winning Chef Jacky Robert was just the icing on the cake.

To begin planning your story, contact resident fairy godmother, Danielle DiGiorgio, a fellow bride-to-be who can deliver a magical experience on any budget.

Client 9: The Rise and Fall of Eliot Spitzer ★★★ At one point during director Alex Gibney's muckraking portrait of Eliot Spitzer, the disgraced former New York governor keeps a straight face while comparing himself to Icarus. It recalls Woody Allen's old joke about how he can't be narcissistic because the mythological character he identifies most with isn't Narcissus, it's Zeus. But Spitzer's hubris remains weirdly endearing, and on the heels of both this picture and Charles Ferguson's Inside Job, he's begun a career rebirth as a cable-news talking head. The downfall of the self-described "Sheriff of Wall Street" is chronicled here with Gibney's usual TV-friendly docu-gloss, presenting a high-and-mighty crusader who made all the wrong enemies and suffered a few too many human imperfections to fulfill his destiny. Unexceptionally made yet extremely watchable, the film works best when exposing the financial services industry's coziness with the high-priced Manhattan sex trade. Some conspiratorial connections are curious, but at the end of the day, Icarus still should've just kept it in his pants. (At Kendall Square and On Demand.)

Conviction ★★ A small-screen picture with a big-screen cast, Conviction tells the true story of Betty Anne Waters, a gutsy Northern Massachusetts waitress whose wayward brother, Kenny, was wrongfully accused of murder. As played by Sam Rockwell, Ken's a bit of a wild man, but he sure as heck ain't no killer. Plucky Betty Anne seeks to prove her big brother's innocence—gosh darn it—even if she has to go to law school herself to get the job done! Hilary Swank headlines as Betty Anne, bringing that specifically Swank-ian strain of toothy gumption that sometimes makes you wish Clint Eastwood would drop by and euthanize her again. The blandly inspirational Conviction goes down painlessly, with a minimum of you-go-girl montages and even less suspense. We never have any doubt as to the outcome or any question of Kenny's innocence. There's just not a lot of conflict in Pamela Gray's screenplay, which strikes me as odd considering that it's about a gross miscarriage of justice that cost a man 18 years of his life. (At Kendall Square, Stuart Street Playhouse, West Newton and in the suburbs.)

Due Date ★★ Director Todd Phillips and star Zach Galifianakis brought an unexpected edge of aggression to 2009's sleeper smash The Hangover, which made sense as it was a tale of loutish dudes on a lost weekend. Alas, their follow-up is a rather shameless rip-off of John Hughes' Planes, Trains and Automobiles starring Robert Downey Jr. as a Type-A yuppie stuck traveling cross-country with Galifianakis' emotionally stunted, grieving loser. Hughes' 1987 holiday perennial might be slightly overrated, but the innate sweetness of Steve Martin and John Candy compensated for the frustrating travel contrivances. In a bold but ultimately misguided move, Phillips ramps up the unpleasantness, complete with gunshot wounds, rampant profanity, one too many car chases and even a masturbating dog. Downey might be the only actor charming enough to get away with punching a child, but the entire enterprise suffers from desperate envelope-pushing. It's ugly for its own sake, with Galifianakis' inscrutable performance suggesting that he's already on his way to becoming the next Jack Black. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Easy A ★★★ With her barbed line readings and world-weary precociousness, Emma Stone has the poise and charm of a less tragic Lindsay Lohan. Stone runs away with this tart teenage riff on Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter. She plays a good girl pretending to go bad in order to enhance her social standing at a prim and proper high school that's lorded over by judgmental Christian kids. It's a welcome skewering of the promise-ring culture, with a game Amanda Bynes providing some gut-busting laughs as a messianic proto-church lady, and two sublime supporting turns from Patricia Clarkson and Stanley Tucci as Stone's hippie parents. Lisa Kudrow and Thomas Haden Church costar as faculty members boasting some suspicious extracurricular activities, while director Will Gluck is able to slip in satirical jabs without going over the top into message-mongering. The busy visual scheme is a bit much, as are the ubiquitous John Hughes references, but Easy A's a breezy lark announcing the arrival of a major star. It isn't quite Clueless, but it'll do. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

CRASH COURSE

Tony Scott and the high art of the stupid movie

Unstoppable ★★★
Starring Denzel Washington, Chris Pine, Rosario Dawson, Kevin Dunn, Ethan Suplee and Kevin Corrigan. Written by Mark Bomback. Directed by Tony Scott. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

THE MOST COMMON complaint leveled against movie critics—I seem to encounter it almost hourly on Internet message boards—is that we "expect every movie to be Citizen Kane." This is often offered as a defense of the latest Transformers movie or some other horrid exercise in filmmaking incompetence that insults both the history of the medium and the intelligence of the audience.

However convenient and ad hominem the attack, it simply isn't true. You can't eat filet mignon for dinner every night, and sometimes you just feel like digging into a greasy cheeseburger. The critic's job, I've always hoped, is to be able to differentiate between Mr. Bartley's and McDonald's. Tony Scott's Unstoppable is an cellent cheeseburger, with particular emasis on the cheese.

This is a slickly made, ferociously efficient achine without a single thought in its head sides entertaining you for 98 minutes and nding you home with a smile. Much to e consternation of people on the Internet, ost critics don't consider this an ignoble piration. We wish more movies would do e same.

Denzel Washington's previous collabora-on with director Tony Scott, last year's nfortunate remake of The Taking of Pelham 1 3, took place on a hijacked subway train that mained immobile for most of the picture.
nstoppable, as the title may have tipped u off, overcorrects in the opposite direc-
on, following a runaway freight train roaring rough rural Pennsylvania. To sweeten the al, this particular choo-choo happens to be den with hazardous chemicals, prompting sario Dawson's railroad manager to deribe it as "a missile the size of the Chrysler ilding!"

Whether or not you take that hyperbolic e-reading in the spirit intended (or are lling to believe that Rosario Dawson could er be a railroad manager) will determine ur tolerance level for this picture, which 're told is based on actual events that I can ly assume have been exaggerated out of all nceivable proportion.

The setup is that because an obnoxious rail-yard worker (Ethan Suplee) wants to have lunch early, enough safety corners are cut that this deadly missile/train is sent chugging along without a conductor. Isn't it terrible luck that a federal safety inspector (indie-darling Kevin Corrigan) just happens to be visiting that day? And did I forget to mention the other train full of sweet, innocent schoolchildren who happen to be headed down the very same track?

Lucky for us, a couple hundred miles down the line we've got grizzled conductor Frank Barnes (Denzel Washington) and his rookie partner Will Colson (Chris Pine) on what was supposed to be a routine assignment. (Cue dramatic music cue here.) Frank's a surly lifer staring down a mandatory retirement package, but he's got a few ideas about how to stop this train that the fat cats downtown don't want to hear about. And the newbie might just have to prove that what he lacks in skill, he makes up for in heart, dammit. (Remember, I said this one was cheesy.)

Unstoppable is Washington's fifth film with Tony Scott, so by now the actor just has to sit back and let his sly gravitas do the talking. Washington might be our most relaxed movie icon since Hollywood's Golden Age, and everything he does looks effortless. Pine, wonderful in last year's Star Trek, cements his movie star status, holding his own against an actor who often chews up his costars. This kid's got the goods.

What makes the film such fun is that there's no villain, just a one-thing-after-another series of logistical problems and physics equations. Scott catches a lot of flak in more rarified circles because, while his big brother Ridley aims for Oscars with epic slogs like the recent Robin Hood, Tony still slums in the action-movie ghetto, delivering unpretentious blockbusters, occasionally overedited to the point of incoherence.

A 66-year-old who always wears a pink baseball cap and khaki shorts, the younger Scott is a fascinating character. He's a walking contradiction whose relentlessly macho movies always contain absurd homoerotic overtones (Top Gun, anybody?). Scott falls for every trendy, flash-in-the-pan visual strategy, which instantly puts a date stamp on his pictures. Yet he often retains a lean, clear, propulsive storytelling style that makes his audio-visual ADD feel almost beside the point. Here's a director who knows what he's doing, most of the time.

Unstoppable's clean narrative lines lock Scott into a scenario where his restless camera style can't stray too far off point, even though the guy apparently has never found a scene that he couldn't shoot from a swooping helicopter.

led material that most folks said couldn't be translated, and it turns out they were right. Yet the movie remains strangely watchable, even when it's bonkers. Especially when it's bonkers. Perry lacks tonal control, the ability to modulate performances and even rudimentary visual skills, but the dude has massive cojones. Ntozake Shange's beloved 1975 play comprised seven women reading a series of 20 poems, telling intertwined tales of abuse, abandonment, abortion and rape. It's an awful lot to juggle, especially since Perry hasn't found a way to organically incorporate Shange's poems into the screenplay. The words are beautiful, the execution garish. For Colored Girls actually works once in a while, when a few of the actresses (most notably Tessa Thompson and Phylicia Rashad) are allowed to hold the screen alone and tear into the language. But such moments throw the awful filmmaking into even sharper relief. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Hereafter ★★ ½ Solemn, heartfelt and a little goofy, Clint Eastwood's 32nd directorial effort will never be confused with his masterpieces. It's his most uneven work behind the camera in years, unusually shaped and, at times, tonally confounding. Despite these flaws, Hereafter also contains moments of beauty and startling power, making the sloppiness forgivable. Anchored by yet another excellent performance by Matt Damon, playing a troubled psychic hiding from the world, Peter Morgan's screenplay follows three separate storylines centered on loss and the afterlife, which inevitably converge in underwhelming fashion. Growing less interested in the title subject as the film progresses, Hereafter eventually seems more concerned with loneliness in this life than anything that happens after death. But as these characters start shaking off their grief, colors bleed back into the images and the shadowy chiaroscuros of Tom Stern's cinematography begin to lift. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Inception ★★★ ½ Ever since his art-house hit Memento, writer/director Christopher Nolan has been obsessed with smashing up the syntax of conventional thrillers. Inception is the kind of pet project that could only happen in the wake of The Dark Knight, as Nolan scored a couple hundred million dollars by helming one of the biggest blockbusters of all time. Inception is an expansive, expensive brain-bender rooted in genre satisfactions; half Solaris, half The Matrix. Leonardo DiCaprio stars as a sullen corporate espionage agent slinking around Kyoto stealing valuable information by infiltrating people's dreams. Cleverly layered, the movie jumbles four separate realities into continuous sequences, as action scenes happen simultaneously across different dimensions but with the same characters. It's a huge movie full of meaty ideas, even when the backbreaking ambition begins to feel like a grind. (At Aquarium and in the suburbs.)

Inside Job ★★★ ½ Documentarian Charles Ferguson—who helmed the extraordinary Iraq documentary No End in Sight—turns his attention to the 2008 economic meltdown. The results are harrowing, infuriating and laced with a surprising strain of gallows humor. Narrated by Matt Damon, Inside Job provides an invaluable guide to credit default swaps and collateralized debt obligations, making Wall Street jargon accessible to even a numerically challenged lunkhead like yours truly. It's hard not to get your ire up watching these exorbitantly compensated robber barons fleecing pension funds with falsely rated junk investments. Ferguson has a gift for clarity, explaining derivatives in ways that flummoxed Michael Moore in last year's dismal Capitalism: A Love Story. Cathartic but less successful is a sequence in which the filmmaker questions a few econ wizards. It's fun to watch them squirm but feels cheap in comparison to the rest of the picture's razor-sharp outrage and simplicity. Everybody who's in some money trouble should see this film. So I guess that means just about everybody should see this film. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

Jackass 3D ★★★ ½ During the decade or so James Cameron spent toiling away on groundbreaking advances in 3-D technology, I wonder if he ever imagined that all his hard work would someday result in a movie where a man plays the trumpet with his butt. Jackass 3D is a technological marvel, the first 3-D motion picture I've seen that justifies that garish surcharge at the ticket booth. Using the cutting edge of stereoscopic effects and cameras, this is stupidity with impeccable technical credentials. OK, so all these brilliant innovations are in the service of genital trauma and flying fecal matter, but it helps that I'm a cretin, and this kind of thing makes me laugh uncontrollably. The gags aren't as death-defyingly baroque as they were in 2006's Jackass Number Two, but the boys aren't getting any younger, either. There's a contagious jubilance to the idiocy of Johnny Knoxville and company, if you dig this sort of foolishness. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Morning Glory ★★★ A cut above the regular rom-com tripe—but a couple notches below the caliber of the talent involved—Roger Michell's daytime TV farce is sprightly, perfectly diverting entertainment. (Though screenwriter Aline Brosh McKenna hews so close to her script for The Devil Wears Prada, you might assume she simply used the find/replace function on her computer.) The innately appealing Rachel McAdams stars as a workaholic producer trying to salvage a moribund morning show hosted by Diane Keaton's dyspeptic Meredith Vieira clone. Her solution is to drag in Harrison Ford's stuck-up Dan Rather wannabe, and the ensuing backstage shenanigans play like Prada's workplace nightmares multiplied. Ford, delivering his first bona fide performance in decades, is hilarious. Too much time is wasted on a go-nowhere romantic subplot between McAdams and stiff Patrick Wilson, but it's an elegantly crafted picture all the same. Michell makes expert use of the widescreen frame and brings the best out of his veteran cast. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Paranormal Activity 2 ★ ½ More of the same, yet it feels like even less. The quickie prequel to last year's smash once again mines a couple jolts and tons of tedium from surveillance footage of damnation's most passive-aggressive demon. Set a couple months before the events of the original picture, Paranormal Activity 2 switches McMansions and focuses on the sister of doomed Katie Featherston. The budget increased from 15 grand to 2.75 million, but the scares are still doggedly lo-fi. As before, this demon initially comes off more like a lousy oommate, turning on the lights, leaving the abinets open and making noise while everybody's trying to sleep. The ante is upped for the equel, though, as the otherworldly intruder ometimes takes the automated pool cleaner ut of the water. Chilling. By now you know the rill: static wide shot of a dark room at night. Hold with eerie silence on the soundtrack. Eventually a door shuts REALLY LOUDLY. Rinse, wash, repeat. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

d ★★ ½ A terrific concept that barely survives a botched execution, this overscaled daptation of the DC comic stars Bruce Willis s a former CIA agent having a terrible time djusting to life in the suburbs. When his old eam is marked for elimination by the new egime, he's got to hit the retirement homes, ound up his old partners and stay one step head of these damn, know-it-all kids. It's an rresistible premise, particularly for fans of he "Get Off My Lawn" genre best epitomized by The Expendables or anything starring Clint Eastwood. Red fills out the ranks with a killer ast, perhaps the most overqualified we've een in a movie mainly concerned with blowing tuff up. Morgan Freeman is all sly smiles and ohn Malkovich brings the crazy as a paranoid asualty of the CIA's LSD experiments. Too bad boilerplate, conspiracy-theory plot shuffles verybody from one exploding set-piece to he next. You can't go wrong with Dame Helen Mirren firing a machine gun, but Red comes wfully close. (At Boston Common, Fenway and n the suburbs.)

e Social Network ★★★★ You might be put off by the prospect of a movie about Facebook, but remember that Citizen Kane wasn't really about the newspaper industry. Like that classic, The Social Network uses a media magnate as an entry point to a story more concerned with loneliness and megalomania. It plays like gangbusters. The unlikely pairing of heart-on-his-sleeve, West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin and clinically dyspeptic, Fight Club director David Fincher is unexpectedly revelatory. Zipping back and forth in time from dorms to deposition rooms, the movie isn't so concerned with legal questions of authorship as it is with class differences and the concept of a level playing field in our tech-savvy era. The last shot is a doozy, though. Sorkin and Fincher might as well be saying: "I'm sorry, Mr. Kane, but Rosebud has still not accepted your friend request." (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

tone ★ ½ Hard to believe, but the sight of Edward Norton in cornrows is one of the least ludicrous things about director John Curran's overripe melodrama. The setup is the stuff of pure pulp, with Norton's greasy convict using his sexpot wife (Milla Jovovich) to blackmail his parole officer (Robert De Niro) into allowing an early release. The logic seems suspect: If you were sleeping with a dangerous criminal's wife, wouldn't you want him to remain behind bars for as long as possible? But then Norton has some sort of bizarre epiphany, prompting him to join a wacky made-up faith based on cosmic audio frequencies, and that's when Angus MacLachlan's screenplay loses its mind. Stone flips from lurid noir to spiritual inquisition, pontificating endlessly about religion and its role in society. In case we're in any danger of missing the point, De Niro and his single grumpy facial expression are never not listening to Christian talk radio, with fire-and-brimstone hosts always conveniently discussing whatever just happened in the previous scene. (At Waltham Embassy.)

The Town ★★ The kind of movie about Charlestown that only somebody from Cambridge could make, writer/director Ben Affleck's latest symptom of townie street-cred envy is chockablock with dropped R's, Celtic tattoos and preposterous gangster movie clichés. Casting himself as the kindest, most-sensitive bank robber a gal could ever want, Affleck models a stunning number of local sports insignias and offers close-ups of his sculpted physique doing pull-ups. Adapted from Chuck Hogan's novel Prince of Thieves, The Town lurches from one dead-end plot thread to the next, piling increasingly absurd action sequences atop mawkish arias of self-pity. Mad Men's Jon Hamm trails two steps behind the gang as a distractingly scruffy FBI agent. Only The Hurt Locker's Jeremy Renner, channeling Jimmy Cagney by way of the projects, makes an impression, but even he gets short shrift in Affleck's maudlin climax that's half–Shawshank Redemption, half-naked narcissism. The final shot is the most unintentionally hilarious thing I've seen in ages. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Waiting for "Superman" ★★★ An Inconvenient Truth director Davis Guggenheim really wants to depress you. As if chronicling the impending end of the world wasn't enough, Guggenheim now sets his sights on our country's troubled public-school system with predictably dire conclusions. Slapping a giant "kick me" sign on the back of powerful teachers' unions, Waiting for "Superman" follows a handful of promising inner-city kids hoping to make the lottery for their local, thriving charter schools. I won't pretend that I'm knowledgeable enough on the subject to gauge the veracity of Guggenheim's blanket assertions, and I'm fully willing to admit that he's overlooking larger issues like systemic poverty and obvious societal inequities. But all that said, the film remains a deeply moving experience. How does your heart not break while watching the fates of children surrendered to a random drawing? (At Kendall Square, West Newton and in the suburbs.)

You Will Meet a Tall Dark Stranger ★ ½ Another of Woody Allen's annual exercises limps into theaters, full of moneyed infidelity, old jazz standards and rote pessimism. It's tempting to just cut-and-paste from my previous reviews of Allen's late-career output, as that seems to be how he writes his screenplays these days. A recycled recitation of the filmmaker's pet themes, You Will Meet a Tall Dark Stranger has all the verve of a contractual obligation. Anthony Hopkins (himself no stranger to half-assing his way through movies) stars as a rich London lout who, spooked by contemplations of mortality, starts going to tanning salons. He quickly takes up with a gold-digging prostitute half his age, leaving his wife to seek the solace of a fortune teller. Meanwhile Naomi Watts and Josh Brolin go through some marital woes of their own, leading to familiar Woody rants about the meaninglessness of life in a godless existence. At least he used to throw in some jokes. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

OMNI VISION

Minus the Bear changes the equation with funky (even sexy) prog-pop.

Minus the Bear plays the Wilbur Theatre on Dec. 7.

JAKE SNIDER HAS LONG heard people categorize his prog-pop band Minus the Bear as "math rock," a term for rhythmically complex guitar rock. It's not a tag usually directed at an indie group with swelling mainstream appeal, and math rock only covers part of the equation when it comes to the Seattle band's evolution.

"There's definitely an intricacy to the way we put things together that can be confused with that stuff," says singer/guitarist Snider, countering that Minus the Bear's use of rhythm, meter and time signature is "fairly straight-up."

Sure, Snider acknowledges, the nine-year-old group tapped the roots of math rock when band members were "on the same page" in listening to such dense '60s and '70s prog-rock influences as King Crimson, Yes and the Mahavishnu Orchestra before they made 2007's Planet of Ice. But in line with members' mellow-to-metal backgrounds before they launched Minus the Bear, the quintet both broadened and simplified its scope on the new album Omni.

"We diverged influence-wise, so we were all approaching this record from a different angle," says Snider, 34. Guitarist Dave Knudson had been absorbing the funk of the Ohio Players and Parliament Funkadelic, bassist Cory Murchy was tuned into dub reggae and drummer Erin Tate stuck with a hip-hop and R&B diet. In the process, the band found a soulful groove on Omni, despite arty melodies and rhythmic shifts that remained coolly precise.

"My Time" sets the disc's retro-futuristic tone, layering both funky and electronic pulses, as well as Knudson's bouncy pattern on a Japanese Omnichord synthesizer. "He gets bored with playing conventional guitar," Snider says. "He started with tapping and loops and sampling, and he wanted to try something else."

Just two songs later, Knudson winds baritone-guitar riffs through "Secret Country," which evokes '80s-era Rush. And keyboardist Alex Rose finds new space throughout the album, often surfing the mix with woozy old-school synth melodies.

Snider credits new producer Joe Chiccarelli for paring down the group's sound with a fresh ear, which included using Rose as a "paintbrush" for a more atmospheric touch than past records.

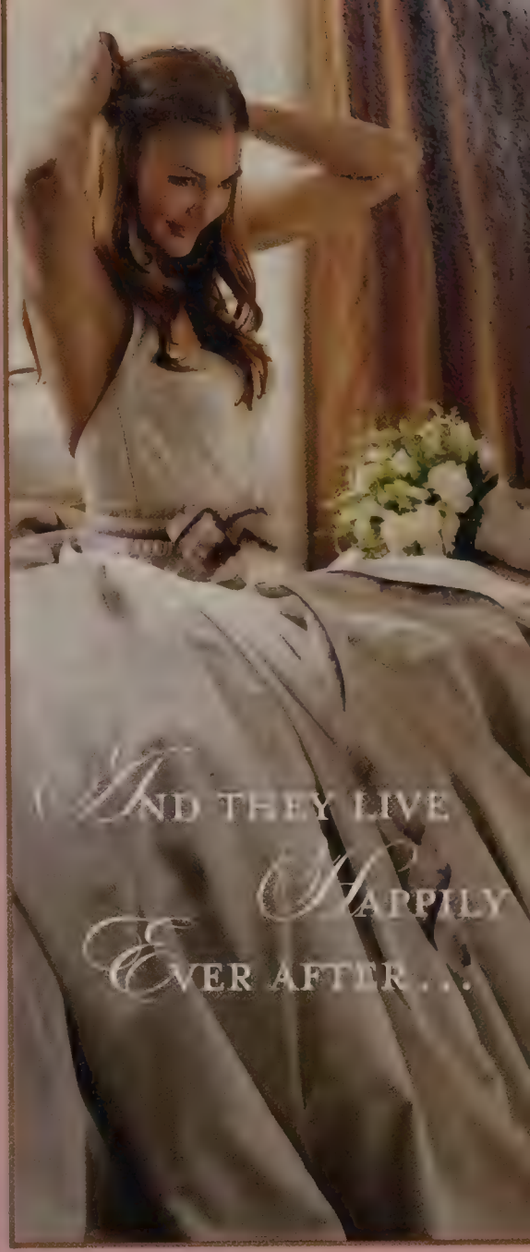
"We went into [the studio] with a really open mind, wanting to take advantage of the experience of having someone who hadn't heard us play or who knew our weaknesses and our strengths," Snider says of the Boston-born Chiccarelli. "The greatest thing he brought to the table was just the ability to get slamming sounds. His engineering skills are just impeccable."

That's what you get when you worked as an engineer for Frank Zappa long before producing recent albums for My Morning Jacket and the Shins. "He was somewhat instrumental in creating more of a pop record and having immediate ideas about what he wanted to get rid of in terms of arrangement changes," Snider says. "He was just an old-school guy and would go out in the studio and move mikes and change amp settings and snare drums, so when you'd go in and listen to the take, it'd sound like a record."

For his role, Snider strikes a different tone in the album's moodier moments, singing with a detached soulfulness that's more reminiscent of Peter Gabriel, Seal or the Blue Nile than the Descendents, Fugazi or Screaming Trees of his punk-fueled youth.

Lyrically, the singer entered conceptual territory, documenting a fictional couple's brief, intense love affair—and dropping a few provocative lines like "The sweat rolls down your thigh," and "When she moved down, she made my back arc."

"It kind of fell into that pattern," he says of the storyline. "Usually I write lyrics when I hear the music, and it just felt sensual or sexual to me."



Minus the Bear has mainly built its audience through touring and returns on Dec. 7 to the Wilbur Theatre, which they packed in May. "We try to bring as much of the record to the live show as possible," the shaggy-haired frontman says. "And it can be pretty intensive." ×××

Fish Tale

Hooked Third-wave ska veterans Reel Big Fish are fixtures on the college- and summer-festival circuits, having performed more than 3000 shows in some 18 years of touring. Drawing on early '90s nostalgia for the Southern California alternative scene, the group has a knack for frequently playing intense, energy-packed sets. Catch Reel Big Fish on Nov. 21 at the House of Blues.

Off the Wall

Safety First The devastation caused by AIDS knows no boundaries, but neither does an artist's imagination. In Graphic Intervention: 25 Years of International AIDS Awareness Posters, signs from over 100 countries detail the fight against AIDS and misinformation about the disease. Some are colorful and flippant, others are ominous and direct, but each uses graphic art to tackle the issue. The exhibit is on display in the Stephen D. Paine Gallery at Massachusetts College of Art and Design through Dec. 4.

Fresh Salman

In a Rushdie After dodging a fatwa and enjoying (a brief) marriage to a gourmet cook and model, life must seem like a fairy tale to Salman Rushdie. Now, following on the heels of the fantastical Haroun and the Sea of Stories, the prolific storyteller arrives at the First Parish Church Meetinghouse on Nov. 29 with the follow-up, Luka and the Fire of Life. In his new tale, a young boy takes a wild quest to a land full of danger, magical creatures and unexpected alliances. THIS PARTY'S COOKING

Cash, Checks and Credit Cards Accepted

It'd better be a doozy of a party to get all the socialites out on a Monday night (their maids get a day off; why shouldn't they?), and Chefs at the Table didn't disappoint.

A benefit for Kids Can Cook, the affair took place at the charity's South End headquarters, where chefs like Evan Deluty, Jim Solomon, Will Gilson, Paul O'Connell and Louis DiBiccari prepared four-course dinners for the likes of retail diva Donna Montgomery, the ever-irreverent Ofer Nemirovsky and his stunning wife, Shelly, the improbably tall Ari Nachmanoff and brunette bombshell Denise Korn, real estate babe Beth Dickerson and the dashing David Drubner, fitness model Tom Potter and so on and so forth.

I lucked out by sitting at the South End Buttery's table, and I felt utterly buttery by the end of the evening. As for the half of the tent who couldn't hear me during the live auction because of the sound system: You bid $10,000. Pay up.

But Can He Walk on Water?

Sticks and stones may break my bones, but bullying will not be tolerated.

That was the message (at least, sort of) when Rocca owners Gary Sullivan and Michela Larson hosted It Gets Better, a fund-raiser for The Trevor Project, which combats suicide among LGBT teens.

Cohosting at the chic South End eatery was its celebrity chef (and former reality TV star) Tiffani Faison (joined by fiancée Kelly Walsh) and the governor's daughter, Katherine Patrick. The predominantly gay, strictly A-list crowd knocked back cocktails, nibbled on delicious food and videotaped inspirational pep talks to be broadcast on YouTube. Among the people I got to rub up on: über-talented singer/songwriter Melissa Ferrick, party boy Chris "Tobie" Tobeck, Channel 7 smoke-show Ryan Schulteis, éminence grise Jerry Feingold, blue-eyed Southern gentleman Tony Glad, silver fox Liz Page, design avatar Javier Cortes and his studly stallion, Gary Arena, Egyptian Adonis Hazem Elbialy, stylist to the stars Sal Malafronte and his boy toy, Darin Contini, peripatetic shutterbug Izzy Berdan, Wasp-in-recovery Ty Dowell, drag divas Ms. Kris Kneivil and Fena Barbitall, corn-fed cutie David Brown and the dashing Ben Perkins, and the absurdly handsome John Gould.

Random snippets of conversation overheard: "Bison 'moo,' don't they?" and "Every time I hear someone say 'chickpea,' I get the urge to chirp." However, the evening's most amusing exchange came when one guest said, "Did you see the pack of photographers outside, waiting for the mayor like it was the Second Coming?" To which someone else responded, "Christ wasn't in office as long."

Goy Vey

Sixty is the diamond anniversary, and I went to the Schepens Eye Institute's 60th anniversary gala at the Mandarin Oriental, Boston thinking the party favor might be from Harry Winston's.

Chocolates aren't bad, though, and it was a thoroughly elegant evening. I spied with my little eye cochair Rosalie Cohen and her marble man, Bert, fashion plate Paula Jaq'lyn with the dapper George Brown, pretty in pink Kay Lyons and the ever-affable Peter, publishing poobah David Jacobs and the ethereal Gen Tracy, honoree Dr. Tatsuo Hirose, and many more worthies than I could count.

Among them was one grande dame who said: "We've had a place on the Cape forever, and we've got a place in Palm Beach. But we just sold our house here, which I was sad about. So I told my husband: 'We need to buy a condo in Boston,' and he said, 'It'll be cheaper to stay at the Four Seasons whenever you want.' So that's the plan."

Where do I sign up?

Meanwhile, the evening's most entertaining exchange took place between two Jewish friends, one of whom lives on the North Shore. "Is there even a synagogue in Essex, or do you have to go all the way to Ipswich?"

"Gloucester," the other guy said, "and I think the rabbi moonlights as a fisherman." ✖✖✖

Present Tense

Not once in my adult life has anyone given me something really fun for Christmas. Like, say, a silver-plated cocktail shaker with my alma mater's coat of arms inscribed over a latticework of pornographic etchings, some of them showing prominent figures in religion and the arts entwined like Escher prints. In fact, I've never gotten anything on my All-Time Wish List: a mating pair of live orangutans, the head of John the Baptist, the Duchy of Pomerania, bagpipes. That damnable Claus! This year, I'm giving everybody smoked reindeer.

The secret to gifting well is, of course, empathy. You have to get inside your recipient's skin—not in the German cannibal sense, but by breaking the fetters of your consciousness. You have to fight the anomie that settles on your soul when you realize that Williams-Sonoma sells a melon scoop for $22. You must become, for a brief, terrifying moment, your octogenarian aunt. This is what powers the scented-candle industry.

Or you could go the surprise route. Does your pal Dave like golf, Brooks Brothers shirts and referring to himself as an "amateur foodie"? Get him a mirror, so he can see what an unoriginal yuppie jerk he is. Does cousin Sally enjoy going to rock shows, painting her fingernails unusual colors and pretending to read Thomas Pynchon? Get her a one-way ticket to Irkutsk so you don't have to deal.

Alternately, just buy what's in our annual gift guide. Everything in it's been vetted.

OF GLEE I SING

HARMONIC VOCAL ARRANGEMENTS are in the cultural spotlight at the moment, which is good news for the Tufts University glee club, the Beelzebubs. "I got a bunch of phone calls from L.A. numbers while I was in the middle of class," says Evan Powell, 20, bass and vocal percussion. "But I waited until after to check my voicemail." The mystery caller was a producer for NBC's Glee, and, last month, their version of Katy Perry's "Teenage Dream" aired on the show. The single promptly hit No. 1 on iTunes and on Billboard's digital chart, and No. 8 on the Billboard Hot 100. On Dec. 3 at Tufts' Goddard Chapel, the Bubs perform and release their new single, "Sweet Caroline/Right Round," sales of which benefit music programs in public schools.

BUN FOR ALL

For years, the Boston Speed Dog hot-dog truck has been parked in the midst of Newmarket Square's meatpacking facilities. But chef Gregg Gale only recently started taking advantage of his location. The latest addition to his previously one-item menu is pastrami, procured from next-door-neighbor Boston Brisket Co., grilled over a wood-charcoal flame until the edges ripple, and piled high on a lightly charred bun with sweet mustard and barbecue sauce. Also note the meaty rumor that Gale will open a brick-and-motor operation near Fenway Park in time for baseball season.

PERSONAL SHOPPER

START EARLY. Pick up gifts when you're traveling or buying birthday presents. I shop all year, but I really make myself start in May. Buy newspapers the day you're shopping and get the coupons for department stores. Try eclectic boutiques outside of the city and look for gifts there. Don't buy something that's too personal. Ask yourself: How well do you know this person? Try to think about the person's hobbies—biker, yoga enthusiast? Buy a gift card to one of the stores that carries hobby or sports items.

Sweeping Trend

Popularized by Carrie Bradshaw in the late '90s, OMBRE HAIR is even bigger now than it was then. Today, Sarah Jessica Parker still rocks the roots-grown-out look, as do an increasing number of celebs. "Ombre is kind of the cousin to balayage," says Nicholas Penna Jr., owner of Salon Capri. "'Balayage' means 'sweeping' in French. It's when the highlights are being done off of the root, so there isn't such a prominent growth line. Recently, it's picked up a lot of speed." For women taking themselves to the salon every 4–6 weeks for touch-ups, ombre hair is an excellent option, and it's refreshingly low-maintenance. Penna swears that women of all ages and hair types can pull off the bohemian trend, which can range from extreme to subtle. "It's a play off of your natural color. I like the dark colors into the warms and the chestnuts into the blondes."

Going Out

Cage-Free

For chef Marco Suarez, there's something special about Jamaica Plain. "It's the friendliest neighborhood in Boston," he says. "But it's a challenge to get my friends to make the trip." One good reason to visit? Canary Square, the second restaurant he's helmed in the area. Housed in the space that was once the Alchemist Lounge, it focuses on elevated bar food and American cuisine.

"I wanted the menu to have approachable food with an elegant twist," says Suarez, who will appear on Food Network's Chopped in early 2011. Entrees like mac 'n' cheese spiked with creamy Taleggio ($15), or wood-roasted chicken with Brussels sprouts, radishes and bacon ($18) are products of the old-school techniques he refined during his time at Eastern Standard Kitchen, Ledge and Bon Savor. His focus here is on local ingredients, including Allandale Farm vegetables, Island Creek oysters and Woodbury shellfish.

Nearly everything in the space is somehow repurposed, reclaimed or recycled. Chairs are constructed from melted-down Coca-Cola bottles, and there's plenty of old barn wood to add warm appeal throughout. "Jamaica Plain is more rustic and bohemian than other parts of the city," says co-owner Jim Cochener who, along with partner Michael Moxley, owns Coda and Common Ground.

"The locals don't have anything like this nearby," Suarez says. "You can stay and linger." An expansive bar with 30 draught beers is flanked by flat-screen TVs. "There are screens that slide over them," Cochener adds. "I think the crowd in JP is more interested in talking to each other than sitting in front of a television."

COMING FULL CIRCLE

A carnivorous food truck

WHICH COMES FIRST: the restaurant or the food truck? Clover Food Lab started with a truck, as did Voltage Coffee in Kendall Square. But for Adam Gendreau and Patrick Gilmartin, owners of the new Staff Meal food truck, their endeavor continues the partnership that launched the short-lived Circle Plates & Lounge in the South End.

Whereas Circle's original concept was small plates, the Staff Meal truck carves out fresher territory. "It's going to be a meat-centric concept," Gilmartin says. "We're meat-centric people. We love dealing with meat." That means head-cheese and other charcuterie made from scratch. Think street food created from what Gilmartin describes as "fine-dining prep" and "high-end techniques." Another unique focus: "We're geared to a late-night crowd, from 8 pm to 1 am." Gilmartin is less forthcoming about the opening date and location. "We're working on that," he says. "Our goal is to negotiate a handful of spots, all in Boston neighborhoods: JP, Roslindale." Watch for it.

BRAD FREDERICKS, the originator/owner of Fajitas & 'Ritas, is teaming up with chef Paul Sussman (Al Forno, Daddy-O's) to open Back Deck of Boston at the corner of Washington and West streets. The theme, Fredericks says, is "anything that tastes good on a grill, from burgers to lobster." Hardwood charcoal is the fuel, "exhibition grills" are the focus and all the windows along West Street will open in fine weather, which we may be enjoying when Back Deck makes its debut sometime in late spring.

DORCHESTER'S TAVOLO has a new chef, Nuno Alves, Jody Adams' sous chef at Rialto for the past four-and-a-half years, will be focusing on "whole-animal cooking" and is butchering meat on-site.

Beer and coffee are a potent mix for Lucy Valena. Thanks to a microfinancing start-up program from Samuel Adams, the Hampshire College grad and West Coast coffee aficionado launched Voltage Coffee, a barista-catering business. Last month, she took up permanent residence in a bright, WiFi-equipped, local art–adorned Kendall Square storefront. The beans are Barrington Roasters, brewed one cup at a time. The tea is from Mem. And the food is a charming assortment of cucumber sandwiches, toast and jam, and ants on a log.

LICORICE IS QUICKERISH
The Ricard Cocktail

Drink of the Moment

Getting His Shot

Mikey Trobagis, 23, is stepping into his first head position as bar manager at Cognac Bistro, and finding a career path has him in good spirits. For his first assignment, owner Nelson Cognac charged him with inventing French-inspired cocktails using ingredients like absinthe, pastis, Fernet and Chartreuse. It's like discovering a love of reading, then being assigned a book report on Finnegans Wake.

Trobagis is up to the challenge, and one evening at the bar, he explains how he and Cognac devised the RICARD COCKTAIL ($6). Served in a shot glass, it combines pastis with a house-made mango puree and apple juice infused with lemongrass and ginger, a combination the duo tweaked and tested on the staff. "Yeah, we all stumbled around and gave great service after that," said one waiter, halfway through his prep work. "Friendlier than we've ever been."

Inspiration came from Trobagis' father. "My dad is a Greek immigrant, and he drank a lot of ouzo. And he just sipped it in a little glass, so I said 'Let's put it in a shooter.'" Now he finds customers both lingering with the drink after dinner and knocking it back with oysters. "If they want to shoot it back, let 'em. But it sips slow."

The brakes are applied by a heavy licorice nose, but the cocktail is light and sweet in the middle before a faint pastis finish. It's a fresh take from someone new to the profession. Or, as described by the hard-working waiter, "It's our pastis de résistance."

CAN'T BUY A BUCKET

Nostalgia is no slam dunk.

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

I THINK IT WAS STREET FIGHTER III. Or maybe it was Mortal Kombat I was playing when my father first snuck up behind my usual perch on the couch to say, "You're not going to play those things when you're older." He instead preferred that I "read challenging books."

My dad thinks of video games as a waste of time. This stance has always struck me as ironic, as it comes from a man who brags about once being able to spend all day at the movies for a nickel.

The fact is, my generation was the first to be born into the era of video games as an influential pop product, an effect only accelerated by games moving out of the arcade and into the home. We're a generation of cartridge blowers, of Genesis defenders. Ask any guy between the ages of 30–39 about the Contra code and get ready for an immediate recitation of directions and letters, an involuntary response as natural as blinking or breathing. While my father may have been awed by the deeds of Long John Silver in Treasure Island, I marveled at the unstoppable force that was Bo Jackson in Tecmo Bowl.

Age doth not wither?

One of my childhood's most iconic games was 1993's NBA Jam. The premise was simple: a two-on-two battle between professional basketball stars. The gameplay was outlandish, with players performing acrobatic dunks from outrageous distances. Secret characters, like Bill Clinton, could be unlocked, and a comic voiceover peppered the action with taglines like "He's heating up" and "Boomshakalaka!" which have become part of the sport's actual lexicon. Riding the popularity of the NBA's heyday and featuring life-like player models—an innovation at the time—NBA Jam made over $1 billion in quarters.

Released earlier this month for Xbox 360 and PS3—it came out in October for Wii—NBA Jam's sentimental hold on my peer group can be seen in a Gchat conversation I had with Improper sports editor Rich Levine.

Rich: We on for Jam tonight?

Me: just bought it

Rich: BONER

Yes, products like NBA Jam are a direct call to our adolescent selves. As Rich explains, it's all about nostalgia. "I can suddenly get back to my teens," he said.

Nostalgia was also the first word from my friend John, a man who owns every system from the Neo Geo to the Virtual Boy, and an NBA Jam Tournament Edition T-shirt. Explaining NBA Jam's appeal, he said, "It's one of those games that anyone can pick up and play."

And we did, at which point we were almost immediately reminded of perhaps the game's greatest strength—infighting. NBA Jam has few rules, little strategy and only one guiding principle: Victory is never assured. As such, it's easy to feel cheated, and half your time is spent complaining. As the rounds progressed, the swearing increased, insults were lobbed and farts were directed at faces. I suppose the adult equivalent would be arguing politics.

Solo play throws the game's biggest negative into relief—its lack of depth. Amazingly, the core content hasn't changed at all in 17 years, and different modes like 21 and Backboard Smash aren't worth more than a glance. In nostalgic cinema terms, they're the needless CGI aliens added to reissued editions of Star Wars. Online play, however, is a welcome addition, evoking the near-forgotten social pressure of arcade play without the anxiety of having to ask your parents for more quarters.

After our final contest, Rich concluded that he liked the game, but it didn't quite bring him all the way back. "That's probably my fault," he said. "Got too old." John, on the other hand, has since contacted me repeatedly, looking for a rematch.

My enthusiasm splits the difference. Were NBA Jam a downloadable title with a corresponding price point (as its producers originally intended), I'd say it's an essential purchase for anyone who once longed for a pair of Reebok Pumps. However, its current $50 price is a prohibitive toll for memory lane.

But, with disc in hand—and much to my father's consternation—I'll continue to play, perched on my own couch, on a TV that sits between my armchair and bookcase. My Xbox next to Anna Karenina. The games stacked next to my copy of Moby Dick. Fittingly, my current station in life at a point somewhere in between. ✖✖✖

You threatened me with arrest for fare evasion after I had paid at Arlington Station on Saturday night. I ride the Green Line every day from Longwood, and have even been issued a $5 "This Is Not a Fare" voucher for past mess-ups on your end. I travel to Roxbury on a weekly basis to play with children at a shelter for homeless teen mothers, and I work as a graduate student at the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute. I wasn't attempting to evade the fare. When you started screaming, I reswiped my card to pay the fare and then proceeded on my way. I kind of wish you had called the cops to arrest me, but I have better things to do. How about you?

To the jackasses on Harvard St.:

I'm not sure if you were drunk or stoned–or just a bunch of jackasses by nature—at 6:30 pm on Nov. 9. There were about 10 of you, male and female, all around college age, walking up Harvard St. in Brookline toward Coolidge Corner. Families, many with small children, were on the sidewalk that evening, yet you chose to yell curses and "hate" words while you waved your hands in their faces. What if that was your child or grandma? Maybe this is pardonable after a night out in Allston, but acting like this at 6:30 pm on a Tuesday makes you pathetic. Harassed on Harvard St.

To flag-fliers:

I was told in grade school that the American flag shouldn't be flown in a damaged condition. Crossing the Mass. Ave. bridge on Veterans Day, I saw Old Glory on the side of a building with a more-than-six-foot rip in it. A lot of good people gave their lives for that and, sadly, are still doing so today. Do it right, or not at all. Proud American

REALITY BITES

Pondering the meaning of "authentic."

AN ENCOUNTER WITH A sham antique gets former Atlantic book editor Richard Todd musing on the zigs and zags that represent "authenticity." Chemicals and clever workmanship had given an appealing box a fake past, but wasn't the beauty of the object authentic enough? Inquiring widely, Todd looks at appearance and reality in many realms. Disneyland comes across as annoyingly fake, while the rhinestone phoniness of Vegas feels somehow more "real."

While he's able to doubt and question himself—oddly, he doesn't dislike celebrities, however Photoshopped their lives—Todd delivers swoops of lyricism and subtlety as he examines the constructedness of war in movies versus the violence of the real thing. Or memoirs, where truth and invention make sketchy bedfellows. He recalls being a "drunken, lecherous, pious hypocrite" at a friend's house; and that man later sees Todd praying on his knees with his family. There's that blushy confluence of the self and selves we all possess. Some philosophers promote the Now as the piercing sword of truth, but Todd counters: "Consciousness is about a remembered past and an imagined future." Even time offers wiggly authenticity. ✖✖✖

The Thing Itself: On the Search for Authenticity
By Richard Todd

Todd lives in western Massachusetts.

FROM PAGE 242: "But I think within these sheltering walls I may sometimes understand another meaning of what it can be to 'live in the moment.' It happens perhaps at a table at night with the closest people and you feel not unpleasantly that you are no more or less real than the candlelight. That they have your substance, your very self, in their hands. That is their gaze and their laughter, their unspoken and inexplicable affection that give you substance, that you are held there like a fallen leaf on an invisible updraft of air."

AT TOWNE, NOTHING IS quiet, small or understated. The Back Bay's new multi-level showpiece, conceptualized by chefs Jasper White and Lydia Shire, is attention-grabbing, boisterous and flashy. As I settled into a table on the second floor with chef Suzi Maitland of Trina's Starlite Lounge, she looked around the space with wide-eyed wonder.

"This place is hoppin'," the Southern girl drawled, taking in the massive open kitchen. Our seats, like most tables in the chandeliered dining room, were strategically positioned to give us a front-row view of the show Shire and her executive chef, Mario Capone, staged on the expo line. Maitland's kitchen could probably fit into a corner of this expanse.

"There are five people on garde manger," she pointed out. How many did she have? "Oh, just me," she replied.

Over a glass of La Posta malbec ($10), we pored over the equally massive menu, which Maitland declared "fun and full of great choices." Descriptions like "Wuxi riblets" and "mad cow" grit cakes reminded her of Trina's own playful menu, which features chicken and waffles and a "dog of the day." But I learned that Maitland is actually very comfortable with fine dining, having worked at the Metropolitan Club and Olives.

Suzi's Picks

Octopus salad
Lobster pizza
Wood-fired duck
Pork chop

"When Beau and Trina [Sturm, co-owners of Trina's Starlite Lounge] brought me on board, I think it showed that they were really serious about the food, that they didn't just want burgers and dogs," she explained.

With that, my guest took control of our order, requesting an octopus salad ($11) and Shire's signature lobster pizza ($26). The octopus arrived on a bed of frisée and fennel dressed with a kiss of peppery avgolemono dressing.

"I find frisée hard to handle without really breaking it apart," Maitland said, munching on an extra-long stalk. "But that octopus is cooked perfectly."

The cracker-thin pizza crust was topped with fleshy chunks of lobster, softened mustard greens and pale, golden slivers of Meyer lemon. A drizzle of citrusy hollandaise tied them all together.

"This is exactly what I've been craving, all this rich, hearty food," Maitland said as we tucked into the wood-fired duck ($28), which featured breast and thigh meat glazed to a toothy crunch, sliced and served resting on a parsnip puree.

Maitland is looking to incorporate similar flavors on her own menu. Although only used twice over the summer, the Starlite smoker will be turning out plenty of sausages for the upcoming season. "It sounds counterintuitive, smoking outdoors when it's freezing cold, but I crave that flavor all winter," she explained.

We savored the taste again with the meat-fest that was the Kurobuta pork chop ($28). Topped with those fatty, tender pork "riblets," the chop was a behemoth, but aptly cooked to a rosy medium-rare. Beside it sat braised baby mustard greens, adding a shock of vinegary tartness to the smoky mix.

We marveled over a side of softly stewed yellow split peas ($6) topped with bits of red onion and parsley. The dish was a sweet and tangy balance that had us both lapping up the last bites.

Satisfied with the peas' lingering sweetness, we skipped dessert and finished our wine while watching the room bubble with energy.

"I love the way it feels in here," Maitland said, basking in the glittery lights. "It's urban, and really alive." ✖✖✖

MY MOM'S BEEN hassling me lately. She's all like, "Clean your room!" and I'm all like, "Later, I'm busy!" and she's all like, "If you don't clean your room, you're grounded!" Yeah, as if. I'm meeting my friends out at Bugaboo Creek tonight and there's nothing anyone can do to stop me. And when I get home, I'm gonna play video games as much as I want. And drink beer, maybe. That's why it's awesome to be 33.

I've ignored my old bedroom at my parents' house for perhaps a decade, and now my mom's campaigning to evict my treasured possessions. My problem afflicts most people who, post-college, move to an urban apartment. There's a discrepancy between the volume of your accumulated stuff and the size of your first abode, which typically offers the airy spaciousness of an airplane bathroom. So you leave all your things behind at your parents' house—but just until you move into a bigger place where you'll have room for it. Suddenly, it's a decade later and your mom's all in your face about how she's gonna throw away your sweet 100GHz PowerMac. Ha. Good luck getting anyone to take it. You know how much lead is in that thing?

The crux of the problem is that my mom already has too much stuff. When I told her that my friend John works as a producer on one of those hoarding shows, she said, "Maybe if I made my place worse I'd qualify for them to come here and clean the house." Now, John tells me that when he goes to a hoarder's house to shoot an episode, he wears flea collars around his ankles. I informed my mom that this isn't the sort of domestic condition that you're supposed to achieve on purpose. That's like saying, "I want to strike up a game of duck-duck-goose, so I'm going to start huffing paint until A&E shows up and puts me on Intervention. That'll get a roomful of people together!"

I figured I'd show up, clean out a few dresser drawers and be on my way. When I arrived, however, I discovered that this initial trip is just scratching the surface. For instance, do I really need keg cups from a party that happened in 1997? I'm thinking it's a little late for re-admittance.

Do I really need keg cups from a party in 1997?

I can probably also live without the scraps of written correspondence from old girlfriends. One letter, from a girl I briefly dated in college, begins, "My brother said you called the other day, but of course he didn't get your number (which is impossible to find, even through information), so I haven't been able to call back." Think about this for a moment: A girl wrote a letter, by hand, and put it in the mail because that was literally the only way she could communicate with me. I'm surprised she didn't go on to describe the quality of her crops and the sad matter of Uncle Jed, who was struck dumb by a thunderclap en route to buy a new buggy whip from the local provisioner.

It's true that I'm a little bitter that I had to laboriously write letters like some kind of Victorian squire, while my collegiate successors casually send sext messages floating through the air with the ease of a Brett Favre pass. I'm pretty sure the Latin on my college diploma translates to, "You were 10 years too early."

Going back further through the archives, I found a bunch of report cards. The underlying theme of them all is that I was a little bastard. On one report from grade six, the numbers 10 and 12 are marked next to several subjects. The corresponding chart indicates, "10 = Inattentive, wastes time" and "12 = Unsatisfactory conduct in class." Another teacher wrote, "Ezra has a natural ability with language. He could do a tremendous job if he tried." Wow, tough crowd. On a basketball-skills evaluation, a coach wrote, "Could stand to show a more positive nature." A French teacher surmised, "Ezra should no longer spend time playing the class clown." Finally, though, a math class progress report shows some positivity, beginning, "I emphatically believe Ezra is an excellent student," and continuing, "His grade is sure to improve due to his superior intellectual ability." Then I remembered that in that class, the teacher let us write our own evaluations. I thought the handwriting looked familiar.

I'm sort of enjoying going through this personal archaeological dig, but I'm realizing that I never would've missed this stuff if I hadn't laid eyes on it in the first place. The solution, then, is to ignore whatever else is in that old room. We tend to fetishize our own pasts a little too much. Plus, I think I hurt my back carrying my old computer. ✖✖✖

SCHOOL SPIRIT

Homecoming games are the pinnacle of football.

I'VE SEEN A LOT OF FOOTBALL games in my sportscasting career, including a few Super Bowls. The one that sticks out most was Super Bowl XXXVI in February of 2002, when the Patriots defeated the St. Louis Rams (then known as "the Greatest Show on Turf"). The Pats entered the game as one of the biggest underdogs in history. Many people thought they were lucky to be there, with guys like Otis Smith and David Patten playing key roles.

I remember that incredible night like it was yesterday. I was so sure they were going to win, I actually picked the exact score: 20-17 (if only I'd been smart enough to bet my mortgage). So the fact that the Patriots won the game, to me, was not a shock. There's something about a hungry football team that makes wonderful things happen.

The same could be said for that first Sunday in February of 2007, after watching the perfect season get destroyed by a Big Blue wrecking ball out of the Meadowlands. I didn't see it coming. Nobody did. But in reality, it was a repeat of what the Patriots did a half-dozen years earlier in New Orleans. The 2007 Giants, just like the 2001 Patriots, were the hungrier team.

Chris Collins is a sportscaster for New England Cable News. Contact him at chris@improper.com.

I've been fortunate to see so many outstanding games simply because the Patriots have been so good for so long. But when it comes to my all-time favorite football entertainment, the Patriots play second fiddle to high school teams. The purity of high school football, the raw emotion untainted by the millions of dollars, makes me yearn for the days when I played. There's nothing that compares to performing for your teammates, your family, your school and your community. It's the sort of pride you can get fired up about.

When it comes to football entertainment, the Patriots play second fiddle to high school teams.

On Nov. 13, I took a two-hour drive due north for alumni weekend at my alma mater, New Hampton School, a tiny prep school tucked in the Lakes Region of New Hampshire. It was homecoming, which meant that a school from down the road, Tilton Academy, was going to be on campus. And there was the Powder Keg—a barrel-shaped trophy up for grabs.

New Hampton vs. Tilton is the third oldest prep school football rivalry in the country, dating back to 1895 when the two schools played their first game against each other. If you went to New Hampton or Tilton, the game evokes tremendous emotion and pride.

This year, I was invited back to deliver the pregame speech—an honor because two decades ago I wore the green-and-white jersey, ready to defend my school's good name. The coach, a former classmate of mine, shot me a text on the ride up that read, "It's a great day to be a Husky." Looking into the players' eyes five minutes before kickoff, I fully understood that it meant as much to them as it had to me. I was nervous—more so than I was when watching the Patriots take the field in New Orleans. And I was pumped.

I left the guys with the mantra "If it is to be, it's up to me," urging each of them to take the onus on themselves to make the next play.

My boys made an entire community proud. They beat Tilton 47-26. It was a great day to be a Husky.

The thousands of people who attend Massachusetts high school football games on autumn days know what I'm talking about. There's a little bounce in our steps, usually with a hot coffee in our hands, ready to experience nirvana in Americana. ✖✖✖

The School of Sports { RICH LEVINE }

ON V-MART, REX, BIG SEY AND SAVARD

5 DECEMBER STORYLINES

SECONDARY EFFORT
McCourty must step up.

C's "Struggles" The Celtics recently lost back-to-back games to the Durant-less Thunder and the regular, old Raptors. Last year, that would've been cause for a freak-out. "They don't care! They're not trying! My God, someone stop Rasheed!" But this year, it's all good. This team is different. They're so motivated and so much healthier—mentally and physically. I know it's early, but I'd be shocked if they're not back in the Finals.

Cheap Sox After the Randy Moss trade, I've tried to temper my knee-jerk reactions to decisions that don't initially make sense. But allowing Victor Martinez to split town over $8M isn't just one decision; it's a trend. One that's seen the Sox repeatedly let legitimate talent walk away for relative peanuts while spending like drunken debutantes in their other business ventures. They could've signed V-Mart through 3015 for the price of Liverpool FC.

Embattled Bruin When Marc Savard took that cheap shot from Matt Cooke back in March, you knew it was bad, but you never thought Savvy'd still be feeling it in November. It looks like he's finally ready, though, and let's hope he can return to form. The more time that passes, the more unforgivable it is that Cooke was never really punished.

Long December You can already tell that this young Patriots defense is destined for bigger and better things. But the question is: Are they ready now? We'll know by the end of this month, after Devin McCourty and the D go head-to-head with the Jets' rush attack, the Packers' aerial assault, the intimidating confines of Soldier Field and the Buffalo winter—which is a lot tougher than the Buffalo Bills.

Flying High It hasn't been the most exciting season for BC football, but have you noticed what's happening with linebacker Luke Kuechly? The kid leads the country in tackles (second place isn't even close), he's one of five finalists for the Nagurski Award (essentially, Defensive Player of the Year) and... he's only a sophomore! What in the name of Mike Mamula is going on in Chestnut Hill?

1 ONE AWKWARD MOMENT

Not that it really affects the team, but how awkward is it that Colin Campbell's son plays for the Bruins? That's like if Judge Ito's kid took a job as the Goldmans gardener—and, you know, it was 1995.

2 EX-PAT SHOUT OUTS

Big Ben KO... When Richard Seymour knocked Ben Roethlisberger on his ass in Week 11, he did it for Pats fans around the world. He did it for fathers of college-aged daughters across the country. He did it for humanity! Or maybe Ben just said something to piss him off. Either way, thanks Big Sey.

Here's to Hobbs... On the same day Seymour clocked Big Ben, Ellis Hobbs got his clocked cleaned—and it made for a scary scene. Anytime a guy's taken off on a stretcher, you're going to feel for him, but there's always a little extra when you know the guy on the gurney. It sucks that he's out for the year, but I'm glad he's alright.

3 Upcoming Milestones

TD12 Did you know that Terry Glenn caught Tom Brady's first career touchdown pass? I didn't. But I do know that nine years later, Brady's closing in on a cool 250. When he reaches the mark—he was six away through Week 11—he'll become the 14th member of that exclusive club. He'll also be only one behind Drew Bledsoe's mark of 251. Damn, Tom. Can't you let the guy have anything?

Jesus Shoots Assuming he stays healthy, Ray Allen will drain his 2,500th career three-pointer by Christmas. But the real celebration comes later in the season, when he surpasses Reggie Miller (2,560 career threes) as the most prolific long-range shooter in NBA history. Poor Reggie. Now the only title he'll hold is "World's Worst Broadcaster."

Leaving His Mark
Only 12 players in NHL history have amassed 1,500 career points. We're talking names like Gretzky, Lemieux, Yzerman, Jagr, Bourque and soon... Mark Recchi. When you consider the guy's only three years younger than Cam Neely, the hefty total is understandable. But I don't care if you play until you're 70—which Recchi might—1,500 doesn't happen by accident. As I type, he's only two points away.

4 DATES TO WATCH

12/1: The Bruins face the Flyers for the first time since the 2010 seven-game playoff disaster that will not be mentioned. Oh wait, crap.

12/3: KG welcomes Joakim Noah back to Boston with open elbows: It's Bulls/Celtics Round 2.

12/6: A full 11 days after their respective Thanksgiving games, the Jets and Pats meet on Monday Night. Should be enough time for Rex Ryan to fully digest his Turkey Day feast. Should be.

12/11: The 2010 Heisman is handed out in NYC, but Cecil Newton already has the trophy preemptively up for bid on eBay.

Soroff On KATHARINE MCPHEE

The singer and actress talks about dye jobs, divas and her biggest celebrity crushes.

POP STAR KATHARINE MCPHEE, 26, FIRST GAINED attention as a contestant on American Idol, where she mesmerized audiences with her rendition of "Somewhere Over the Rainbow." Born and raised in the Los Angeles area, she attended Boston Conservatory but left to pursue her singing and acting career. She was the runner-up on American Idol in 2006, and her first solo album debuted at No. 2 on the Billboard Top 200 in early 2007. Her TV credits include CSI: New York and Ugly Betty, and she costarred in the 2008 hit The House Bunny. She has a lead role in the upcoming film You May Not Kiss the Bride and a new holiday album, Christmas Is the Time to Say I Love You. McPhee will appear at the Boston Common Holiday Tree Lighting on Dec. 2. She lives in L.A.

Jonathan Soroff: Favorite thing about Boston Conservatory?
Katharine McPhee: I made some of my closest friends there.

Favorite reality TV show?
I'm kind of obsessed with the Kardashians.

So Kim is your favorite?
Actually, Khloe is. I hung out with her one night at a club here in L.A., which isn't something I do often. She was just a cool chick. I liked her. I like her sassiness.

Ever considered doing opera?
[Laughs.] No. I've never had that kind of higher register to my voice. I could do musical theater.

Can you be a pop star without being pretty?
Sure. The music industry goes through phases where certain types are in demand. Especially right now, there are some very interesting-looking girls I wouldn't call traditionally pretty.

Is your appearance important to your career?
I don't know if it's important to my career, but it's important to me. [Laughs.] I love looking good and feeling good. But I think my look matches my voice. It suits the music.

Are you haunted by the ghost of Judy Garland?
Not her ghost, per se, but the song, yeah. There isn't really a place I can go to perform where they don't want to hear it, and I'm fine with that.

Do you vote on American Idol?
I actually don't watch the show anymore, not because I don't like it, but because I don't have that much time.

Who's your favorite American Idol winner?
I guess Kelly Clarkson. But I love Carrie Underwood, too. I love what they've done with their music.

Is Joe Schmoe really qualified to judge music?
Why not? They're the ones who ultimately end up buying CDs or tickets to see a show.

TV show for which you'd love to have written the theme song?
Probably Friends. That's such a good song.

Who's your favorite diva of all time?
Probably Celine Dion. Growing up, my favorite was Mariah Carey. I love women who can sing circles around everybody else, and Mariah hasn't kept her voice in the same way Celine Dion has. Celine is the shit.

Do you listen to classical music?
Not a lot. But at Boston Conservatory, I got my roommate hooked on Rachmaninoff. We'd listen to it every night before we went to bed.

Who would win in a tug-of-war: Madonna or Lady Gaga?
Lady Gaga. She's got more fire in her belly, and she's younger.

Person you'd most like to sing a duet with?

So do blondes really have more fun?
I'm not blonde anymore, but if you're a natural blonde, maybe they do. If you're a blonde out of a bottle, like I was, it's a lot of work.

Who's your celebrity crush?
I've kinda gotten over this one, but I did an episode of Community, and basically I was making out with Joel McHale the entire week, so that sort of played with my emotions a bit. Just kidding. He's married and so am I, but I do kinda have a crush on him. And then Matthew Morrison. We've run into each other, and there's chemistry there.

Your Christmas album dropped before Halloween. Isn't the whole Christmas starting right after Labor Day thing getting out of control?
It is! The stores have Christmas decorations in October. I guess they figure that if they put the stuff out, people will buy it.

Best Christmas present you ever got?
As a little kid, one Christmas I opened the door and there was this huge stretch limo. My parents were surprising us with a trip to Hawaii. Even if you're not a kid you'd think that was the coolest thing in the world.

Best perk of being a pop star?
Free shit.

Best swag you ever got?
Purses are probably my favorite thing. I love the beauty products, too. A lot of times, you get stuff you don't end up using. So you either regift or stick it in the closet, and when you say, "Oh! I'm out of face wash," you have a secret stash.

Worst thing about being a pop star?
Everyone has bad days and getting caught at it is embarrassing. I've gotten better about it. No matter how bad a mood you're in, it's not gonna kill you to stop for 30 seconds and be nice.

Worst and best thing about acting?
I just love being on set. Craft services is a little challenging at times because they always have donuts, and I love donuts. But that's also one of the best parts.

Funniest thing you ever read about yourself?
That I was too skinny. That always makes me laugh. I love when they have some doctor weighing in as an expert, saying, "Yes, her collarbone is showing. It looks very unhealthy." Are you freaking crazy? It's a collarbone.

When did you realize you were a pop star?
I still haven't reached that moment. I don't know that I ever will. ×××

BEWARE OF GREEK TYCOONS BEARING GIFTS...

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

AS F. SCOTT FITZGERALD SO famously (and fatuously) put it, "The rich are different from you and me." And as Ernest Hemingway apocryphally replied, "Yes, they have more money." Indeed. Rich people can afford furs and jewelry and whatever foolishness the Neiman Marcus catalogue is peddling this year. (His and Hers sub-Saharan African countries, anyone?)

But just because they can buy these things, does that mean they give them as presents? Obviously, the rich have more choices in what to give their loved ones for the holidays—somebody who can fly to Dubai for a sueded-python handbag, or pop into Cartier for a sparkly little custom-made something, doesn't have to rely on gift cards to the Olive Garden. And because they can afford to be deemed →

"eccentric" and indulged for it [as opposed to "crazy" and institutionalized], they have the option of choosing something odd. So what gives with gift-giving among the very, very rich?

A lot of them insist on some version of, "I give what I'd want to receive" (this from a hedge-fund billionaire), or "I try to keep it simple" (from a woman who just downsized from an obscenely grand house to a merely grand one). Several wealthy acquaintances offered flawlessly tasteful suggestions like, "I've been doing a lot of homemade things. Maybe a recipe with the ingredients all packaged in a pot." Unsurprisingly, some rich people are grossly cheap. A man worth hundreds of millions of dollars gave a business partner of six years a pair of movie passes as a wedding present. One trophy wife I spoke to complained about getting an ironing board for Valentine's Day (although that was from husband number one). The daughter of a music-industry mogul says, "I worked for this billionaire loser in the theater business who gave me $50 as my Christmas bonus," and she points out that the Dolan family [founders of Cablevision] used to dole out turkeys to their employees from the back of an 18-wheeler.

Such tightfistedness can be misleading, though. The son of one of the richest men in the world admits to having given his wife a label-maker for Christmas. His wedding gift to his brother: a butter slicer. In his defense, the man says his wife uses the label-maker all the time, and that he bought the butter slicer, "because I'd been living at my brother's house and noticed he didn't have one. The card said, 'I'll always be there to notice the little things.' I like to err on the side of modesty." It's worth pointing out that as a wedding gift to close friends, he and his wife typically pick up the tab for the honeymoon.

What's more surprising than protestations of restraint is the willingness of the rich to regift, a no-no no more. "I'm beginning to think that the whole notion of regifting is an excellent one," says the wife of a venture capitalist. "I've been clearing out my kids' rooms and sorting through mountains of stuff. I may regift some things right back to them. I bet they won't even notice." In regards to regifting: Not only do rich people already have more stuff than the rest of us, but it's one of life's perverse little jokes that they get lots of swag for free. A $1,000-per-head charity gala is liable to have Tiffany candlesticks as party favors—perfect for passing along as a hostess gift. Or, as a manufacturing heiress who lives in London says, "Some of my favorite presents were regifted. Armani sunglasses, a pair of Marco Bicego earrings I love. With regifting, the cardinal rule is to know what's in the box. More than once I've opened gifts from a certain person and they're engraved, 'To...' and 'From...'" She adds that honesty about regifting is part of the fun. "I once got this incredibly useless thing from a very famous friend of my mother who lives in New York. I sent it to a friend in the States with a card that said, 'I win! Celebrity regift with Double Pond Jump.' He eventually beat me by giving me something his dead mother had given to him: Regifting from beyond the grave."

Of course, gift-giving patterns diverge along the age-old distinction between Old Money and New. One self-made man with a boutique investment firm says, "This year, my family's giving the unique and priceless gift of ourselves: Christmas together on the beach. Nine days. No boxes. Just bathing suits." Another man of once-modest means who now manages assets for people worth $25 million and up says, "My clients have given me everything from antique timepieces to fine art, and most of them give family members the annual IRS-excluded gift of $13,000 per individual. I personally make a donation to a local charity and include a note in our holiday card, which people really seem to appreciate."

Rich people a few generations removed from the wellspring of their fortunes skew more unorthodox. One Brahmin I know got a Belgian shotgun from her grandfather for her 16th birthday, while the aristocratic scion of a Hong Kong banking fortune says, "My favorite gift of all time is definitely the Ashera. It's a hypo-allergenic cat that's a cross between a domestic house cat and a few wild breeds from Africa and Asia. It sits over 3 feet tall and walks on a leash in public, and it only costs $36,000. Deal. Of. The. Century."

For eccentricity, Southern people have an edge, probably because of how dearly they cherish their lunatics, and on account of the premium they put on idiosyncrasy. The daughter of a former Nixon crony and his Warhol-intimate wife recalls that, as a little girl, her father would have her portrait painted every year for the family Christmas card. "But throughout my childhood there were always two people whose presents were saved to be opened in front of everyone as a sort of spectacle. One was a cousin who clearly shopped the after-Christmas sales and then parceled them out with no regard for appropriateness. A child might get a cast-resin statue of Madame Récamier, or a plastic cheese-and-cracker tray shaped like a tennis racquet (crackers went along the handle). The other was a female family friend whose gifts were lewd, although occasionally tastefully lewd, like a very beautiful Hermès-like tie that on closer inspection had small forks and the letter "u." As we got older, they became things she'd confiscated from her own kids—a stoplight, a huge bag of uncleaned weed (my parents didn't know what it was)—and then one year she had her dilapidated station wagon towed into our driveway."

The very rich are at their most extravagant when they want to impress their even richer friends. A Miami heiress says, "My step-mother always gives me sock-drawer gifts, but she'll buy a fancy friend an expensive watch." From a woman who divorced well: "My ex-husband would give a really over-the-top gift to a guy he'd played golf with once. It was mortifying."

Even more important than pissing contests, however, is the greatest motivator of all—love. Someone who was dating a Forbes rich-lister says, "The most extravagant gift he ever gave me was completely spontaneous. We were at an auction of the top young racehorse prospects in the world, the day before my birthday. We were there solely as observers, but as I drooled over one particular horse, my then-partner forced my hand up. A split second and $250,000 later, the horse was mine. I was both thrilled and in shock." Another friend received a beach house on her favorite stretch of Martha's Vineyard for her 10th wedding anniversary. Even better was the fact that she learned about it as her tech-mogul husband flew her over in his helicopter (having demanded that the closing take place on their actual anniversary or the deal was off).

Some stories don't have happy endings, though. A woman in high-net-worth banking recalls "a client who bought his girlfriend a Challenger 300 (airplane), filled it with Champagne and caviar and took her to New York." Even more expensive for him, though, was the fact that his wife was at the airport to wave him good-bye. It cost him $100 million in the divorce.

In the end, the common denominator between the very rich and the rest of us in terms of gift-giving is probably the fact that what's important is how it makes the giver feel. My own stepfather was what you'd call "comfortable," but no Croesus. He provided handsomely for his family, belonged to a country club, dressed well, traveled in style and didn't give much thought to the prices on restaurant menus. And he was crazy about my mother. For Christmas—and he was Jewish—he enjoyed nothing more than spoiling her. There was the year he gave her a double strand of pearls with an opal and diamond clasp. There were at least two in which he gave her fur coats. But nothing beat the wow factor of the Christmas morning when my mother woke up, looked out at the driveway and found a brand-new Saab with a bow on it. I would've given anything to have stock in Kleenex the way my mother carried on, and I'll wager that, at that moment, my stepfather felt like the richest man in the world. ×××

Lady Dada

Avant Garden Inspired by the Dada surrealist movement and German folklore, The Blue Flower isn't the sort of musical to feature Von Trapps or fair ladies. Jim and Ruth Bauer's twisted show incorporates silent film, a sweeping score and graphic imagery to depict a tangled love rectangle between two couples (comprising some notable historical figures) as they trek across Paris, war torn Germany and New York. Flower blooms at American Repertory Theatre through Jan. 8.

Conviction ★★ A small-screen picture with a big-screen cast, Conviction tells the true story of Betty Anne Waters, a gutsy Northern Massachusetts waitress whose wayward brother, Kenny, was wrongfully accused of murder. As played by Sam Rockwell, Ken's a bit of a wild man, but he sure as heck ain't no killer. Plucky Betty Anne seeks to prove her big brother's innocence—gosh darn it—even if she has to go to law school herself to get the job done! Hilary Swank headlines as Betty Anne, bringing that specifically Swank-ian strain of toothy gumption that sometimes makes you wish Clint Eastwood would drop by and euthanize her again. The blandly inspirational Conviction goes down painlessly, with a minimum of you-go-girl montages and even less suspense. We never have any doubt as to the outcome or any question of Kenny's innocence. There's just not a lot of conflict in Pamela Gray's screenplay, which strikes me as odd considering that it's about a gross miscarriage of justice that cost a man 18 years of his life. (Somerville Theatre, West Newton and in the suburbs.)

Due Date ★★ Director Todd Phillips and star Zach Galifianakis brought an unexpected edge of aggression to 2009's sleeper smash The Hangover, which made sense as it was a tale of loutish dudes on a lost weekend. Alas, their follow-up is a rather shameless rip-off of John Hughes' Planes, Trains and Automobiles starring Robert Downey Jr. as a Type-A yuppie stuck traveling cross-country with Galifianakis' emotionally stunted, grieving loser. Hughes' 1987 holiday perennial might be slightly overrated, but the innate sweetness of Steve Martin and John Candy compensated for the frustrating travel contrivances. In a bold but ultimately misguided move, Phillips ramps up the unpleasantness, complete with gunshot wounds, rampant profanity, one too many car chases and even a masturbating dog. Downey might be the only actor charming enough to get away with punching a child, but the entire enterprise suffers from desperate envelope-pushing. It's ugly for its own sake, with Galifianakis' inscrutable performance suggesting that he's already on his way to becoming the next Jack Black. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

For Colored Girls ★★ Every nine months or so, Tyler Perry cranks out another soap opera in which he wears a dress. But now he's tackled material that most folks said couldn't be translated, and it turns out they were right. Yet the movie remains strangely watchable, even when it's bonkers. Especially when it's bonkers. Perry lacks tonal control, the ability to modulate performances and even rudimentary visual skills, but the dude has massive cojones. Ntozake Shange's beloved 1975 play comprised seven women reading a series of 20 poems, telling intertwined tales of abuse, abandonment, abortion and rape. It's an awful lot to juggle, especially since Perry hasn't found a way to organically incorporate Shange's poems into the screenplay. The words are beautiful, the execution garish. For Colored Girls actually works once in a while, when a few of the actresses (most notably Tessa Thompson and Phylicia Rashad) are allowed to hold the screen alone and tear into the language. But such moments throw the awful filmmaking into even sharper relief. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows: Part I ★★ Half a movie at full-ticket price, the seventh film of this beloved series follows in the footsteps of last summer's woefully underwhelming Half-Blood Prince, serving as a glum exposition dump with no payoff. Adored by the rabid fans of JK Rowling's books and confounding to us Muggles, the Potter films are increasingly alienating to anyone not up-to-date on Quidditch strategy. Presupposing a familiarity with the source material, the latest installment begins mid-speech and ends with a cliffhanger. Constant references are made to the events of previous pictures, which some of us haven't seen in years and frankly can't remember all that well. A shame, as director David Yates' first crack at the franchise (2007's Order of the Phoenix) was the only Potter film to function as a stand-alone movie. No such luck this time, and some lovely visuals can't compensate for a brutal second half in which all the kids mope around the woods like it's wizard Twilight. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Hereafter ★★ ½ Solemn, heartfelt and a little goofy, Clint Eastwood's 32nd directorial effort will never be confused with his masterpieces. It's his most uneven work behind the camera in years, unusually shaped and, at times, tonally confounding. Despite these flaws, Hereafter also contains moments of beauty and startling power, making the sloppiness forgivable. Anchored by yet another excellent performance by Matt

Anne Hathaway can't save this uneven production.

Love and Other Drugs ★★½
Starring Anne Hathaway, Jake Gyllenhaal, Josh Gad, Oliver Platt, Hank Azaria and Jill Clayburgh. Based on the book Hard Sell: The Evolution of a Viagra Salesman by Jamie Reidy. Screenplay by Charles Randolph, Edward Zwick and Marshall Herskovitz. Directed by Zwick. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

YES, THIS IS THE MOVIE WHERE THEY'RE NAKED. It's sad that depictions of adult sexuality have become so rare in mainstream movies that Edward Zwick's Love and Other Drugs can ride a tsunami of breathless coverage, from magazine covers to SNL jokes, about stars Anne Hathaway and Jake Gyllenhaal getting it on. (Those with longer memories might recall that these two crazy kids already did the deed five years ago in Brokeback Mountain.) Although I guess the sex-sells strategy will probably move more tickets than if they'd just called it a movie about Parkinson's Disease.

Actually, it's about a lot of things. Love and Other Drugs is by turns a raunchy bedroom farce, a health-care industry satire, a chick flick and a '90s nostalgia piece wistful for those bygone days of economic prosperity. Watching it sometimes feels like channel surfing.

Demonstrating a keen ear for the decade's most wretched music, the film kicks off with the Spin Doctors' "Two Princes" introducing Jake Gyllenhaal's Jamie Randall, a callow young stud picking up babes on the sales floor of an electronics store. Fired for banging the boss' girlfriend in the supply closet, our swaggering lech soon stumbles into the pharmaceutical industry. Turns out that drug rep for Pfizer is the perfect gig for someone with Jamie's supreme schmoozing skills and abject moral bankruptcy. Before long he's got access to every doctor's office in town by keeping their secretaries on speed dial.

But he meets his match in Hathaway's Maggie Murdock, a brassy Bohemian artist who shares his hobby of casual fornication. They barely make it through the front door before they're going at it, and once they're done, she boots him out before he can button his pants. Tired of the clingy types, Jamie's smitten with Maggie's no-strings-attached policy. But their business-like arrangement is short-lived, as pesky conversations break out amid all the heavy breathing. Despite the best efforts of both parties, they soon find themselves in (gasp!) a relationship.

This gets tricky, as we've learned from her very first scene that Maggie suffers from early onset Parkinson's. Thanks to Hathaway's marvelous, prickly performance we see a young woman always on her guard, determined to shield herself from any attachments, as they'll inevitably end in heartbreak. Maggie's resigned to her disease and living for the moment, only hooking up with Jamie in the first place because he seems like precisely the kind of lout that she won't have to worry about falling for. It's a gutsy turn with some surprisingly sharp edges.

But the sharper Hathaway gets, the gummier Love and Other Drugs becomes. Gyllenhaal winds up repping the company's new wonder drug, something called Viagra, thus sending the film off into a very long detour full of broad caricatures, priapism gags and moneymaking montages. There's an obvious point here about Big Pharma devoting more resources to sustaining erections than to curing diseases, but it's expressed in the most ham-fisted way, with real-life Parkinson's sufferers just coming out and saying as much directly into the lens. The buoyant, bawdy energy of the film's first hour depletes in a hurry, as Jamie is required to grow up and accept the fact that Maggie isn't going to get any better.

Gyllenhaal is Hollywood's luckiest actor, and not just because his job entails rolling around with a naked Anne Hathaway. Has such a modestly talented actor ever been so consistently outmatched onscreen? Whether with Heath Ledger in Brokeback Mountain or Mark Ruffalo and Robert Downey Jr. in Zodiac, Gyllenhaal has made a career out of being adequate while acting opposite greatness. He has some fun with Jamie's carefree caddishness during the picture's first half, even though he's so transparently mimicking Tom Cruise that he even dons the Risky Business Ray-Bans. But as the film grows more maudlin, he can't hold his own next to his costar.

Director Edward Zwick has devoted most of his career to stolid, historical epics like The Last Samurai and Defiance. Love and Other Drugs is a throwback to his first feature, the 1986 Rob Lowe vehicle About Last Night..., which softened up David Mamet's play Sexual Perversity in Chicago to an almost comical extent. Grateful as I am that Zwick is getting back to his roots instead of burdening us with another three-hour Oscar effort, the mish-mash of tones is clearly beyond his control. There's a lot of funny stuff in this film, none of which involves Jamie's perpetually masturbating brother (Josh Gad), who seems to have wandered in from a Judd Apatow knockoff.

Still, Hathaway is a marvel. She's savvy enough an actress to understand that a character suffering from a terminal illness doesn't need to go looking for sympathy, creating a tough, angry, complicated woman.

The character of Maggie Murdock deserved a better lot in life. And she deserved a better movie. ✖✖✖

Damon, playing a troubled psychic hiding from the world, Peter Morgan's screenplay follows three separate storylines centered on loss and the afterlife, which inevitably converge in underwhelming fashion. Growing less interested in the title subject as the film progresses, Hereafter eventually seems more concerned with loneliness in this life than anything that happens after death. But as these characters start shaking off their grief, colors bleed back into the images and the shadowy chiaroscuros of Tom Stern's cinematography begin to lift. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Inception ★★★ ½ Ever since his art-house hit Memento, writer/director Christopher Nolan has been obsessed with smashing up the syntax of conventional thrillers. Inception is the kind of pet project that could only happen in the wake of The Dark Knight, as Nolan scored a couple hundred million dollars by helming one of the biggest blockbusters of all time. Inception is an expansive, expensive brain-bender rooted in genre satisfactions; half Solaris, half The Matrix. Leonardo DiCaprio stars as a sullen corporate espionage agent slinking around Kyoto stealing valuable information by infiltrating people's dreams. Cleverly layered, the movie jumbles four separate realities into continuous sequences, as action scenes happen simultaneously across different dimensions but with the same characters. It's a huge movie full of meaty ideas, even when the backbreaking ambition begins to feel like a grind. (At Aquarium and in the suburbs.)

Inside Job ★★★ ½ Documentarian Charles Ferguson—who helmed the extraordinary Iraq

Well-Cast

Nobody Beats the Wiz

Daniel Radcliffe, Rupert Grint and Emma Watson reprise their famous roles in Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows: Part I.

documentary No End in Sight—turns his attention to the 2008 economic meltdown. The results are harrowing, infuriating and laced with a surprising strain of gallows humor. Narrated by Matt Damon, Inside Job provides an invaluable guide to credit default swaps and collateralized debt obligations, making Wall Street jargon accessible to even a numerically challenged lunkhead like yours truly. It's hard not to get your ire up watching these exorbitantly compensated robber barons fleecing pension funds with falsely rated junk investments. Ferguson has a gift for clarity, explaining derivatives in ways that flummoxed Michael Moore in last year's dismal Capitalism: A Love Story. Cathartic but less successful is a sequence in which the filmmaker questions a few econ wizards. It's fun to watch them squirm but feels cheap in comparison to the rest of the picture's razor-sharp outrage and simplicity. Everybody who's in some money trouble should see this film. So I guess that means just about everybody should see this film. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

Jackass 3D ★★★ ½ During the decade or so James Cameron spent toiling away on groundbreaking advances in 3-D technology, I wonder if he ever imagined that all his hard work would someday result in a movie where a man plays the trumpet with his butt. Jackass 3D is a technological marvel, the first 3-D motion picture I've seen that justifies that garish surcharge at the ticket booth. Using the cutting edge of stereoscopic effects and cameras, this is stupidity with impeccable technical credentials. OK, so all these brilliant innovations are in the service of genital trauma and flying fecal matter, but it helps that I'm a cretin, and this kind of thing makes me laugh uncontrollably. The gags aren't as death-defyingly baroque as they were in 2006's Jackass Number Two, but the boys aren't getting any younger, either. There's a contagious jubilance to the idiocy of Johnny Knoxville and company, if you dig this sort of foolishness. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Morning Glory ★★★ A cut above the regular rom-com tripe—but a couple notches below the caliber of the talent involved—Roger Michell's daytime TV farce is sprightly, perfectly diverting entertainment. (Though screenwriter Aline Brosh McKenna hews so close to her script for The Devil Wears Prada, you might assume she simply used the find/replace function on her computer.) The innately appealing Rachel McAdams stars as a workaholic producer trying to salvage a moribund morning show hosted by Diane Keaton's dyspeptic Meredith Vieira clone. Her solution is to drag in Harrison Ford's stuck-up Dan Rather wannabe, and the ensuing backstage shenanigans play like Prada's workplace nightmares multiplied. Ford, delivering his first bona fide performance in decades, is hilarious. Too much time is wasted on a go-nowhere romantic subplot between McAdams and stiff Patrick Wilson, but it's an elegantly crafted picture all the same. Michell makes expert use of the widescreen frame and brings the best out of his veteran cast. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

127 Hours ★★ In 2003, Aron Ralston was on a solo climbing expedition in Utah's Blue John Canyon when he fell and got his right arm pinned by a boulder. With no food, precious little water, and not a soul for miles, Ralston was trapped for five days, eventually freeing himself by cutting off his arm with the dull blade of a cheap multipurpose tool. It's a grim survival tale—and another reminder of why I seldom go outdoors. But Slumdog Millionaire director Danny Boyle tackles the story with his usual frenzy, zipping the camera around and throwing so much junk at the screen, I thought I saw a kitchen sink in there somewhere. It's all so busy, so self-consciously virtuosic, that the movie never engages with its own premise. Despite a fine one-man-show by James Franco, we never face the horror of Ralston's isolation, as the five days go by awfully fast. There's no catharsis when he's freed because the movie never bothered to sit still. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square, Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

Paranormal Activity 2 ★ ½ More of the same, yet it feels like even less. The quickie prequel to last year's smash once again mines a couple jolts and tons of tedium from surveillance footage of damnation's most passive-aggressive demon. Set a couple months before the events of the original picture, Paranormal Activity 2 switches McMansions and focuses on the sister of doomed Katie Featherston. The budget increased from 15 grand to 2.75 million, but the scares are still doggedly lo-fi. As before, this demon initially comes off more like a lousy roommate, turning on the lights, leaving the cabinets open and making noise while everybody's trying to sleep. The ante is upped for the sequel, though, as the otherworldly intruder sometimes takes the automated pool cleaner out of the water. Chilling. By now you know the drill: static wide shot of a dark room at night. Hold with eerie silence on the soundtrack. Eventually a door shuts REALLY LOUDLY. Rinse, wash, repeat. (In the suburbs.)

Red ★★ ½ A terrific concept that barely survives a botched execution, this adaptation of the DC comic stars Bruce Willis as a former CIA agent having a terrible time adjusting to life in the suburbs. When his old team is marked for elimination by the new regime, he's got to hit the retirement homes, round up his old partners and stay one step ahead of these damn, know-it-all kids. It's an irresistible premise, particularly for fans of the "Get Off My Lawn" genre best epitomized by The Expendables or anything starring Clint Eastwood. Red fills out the ranks with a killer cast, perhaps the most overqualified we've seen in a movie mainly concerned with blowing stuff up. Morgan Freeman is all sly smiles and John Malkovich brings the crazy as a paranoid casualty of the CIA's LSD experiments. Too bad a boilerplate, conspiracy-theory plot shuffles everybody from one exploding set-piece to the next. You can't go wrong with Dame Helen Mirren firing a machine gun, but Red comes awfully close. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Social Network ★★★★ You might be put off by the prospect of a movie about Facebook, but remember that Citizen Kane wasn't really about the newspaper industry. Like that classic, The Social Network uses a media magnate as an entry point to a story more concerned with loneliness and megalomania. It plays like gangbusters. The unlikely pairing of heart-on-his-sleeve, West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin and clinically dyspeptic, Fight Club director David Fincher is unexpectedly revelatory. Zipping back and forth in time from dorms to deposition rooms, the movie isn't so concerned with legal questions of authorship as it is with class differences and the concept of a level playing field in our tech-savvy era. The last shot is a doozy, though. Sorkin and Fincher might as well be saying: "I'm sorry, Mr. Kane, but Rosebud has still not accepted your friend request." (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Town ★★ The kind of movie about Charlestown that only somebody from Cambridge could make, writer/director Ben Affleck's latest symptom of townie street-cred envy is chockablock with dropped R's, Celtic tattoos and preposterous gangster movie clichés. Casting himself as the kindest, most-sensitive bank robber a gal could ever want, Affleck models a stunning number of local sports insignias and offers close-ups of his sculpted physique doing pull-ups. Adapted from Chuck Hogan's novel Prince of Thieves, The Town lurches from one dead-end plot thread to the next, piling increasingly absurd action sequences atop mawkish arias of self-pity. Mad Men's Jon Hamm trails two steps behind the gang as a distractingly scruffy FBI agent. Only The Hurt Locker's Jeremy Renner, channeling Jimmy Cagney by way of the projects, makes an impression, but even he gets short shrift in Affleck's maudlin climax that's half–Shawshank Redemption, half-naked narcissism. The final shot is the most unintentionally hilarious thing I've seen in ages. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Unstoppable ★★★ Director Tony Scott's fifth collaboration with Denzel Washington is a slick, efficient machine without a single thought in its head besides keeping you entertained for 98 minutes. Based on actual events presumably exaggerated out of all conceivable proportion, the film follows a runaway freight train roaring through

The Fourth Kind, it's not, although in its day, this movie was scarier than trying to figure out what you did after a night of too many Four Lokos. The Day the Earth Stood Still is the classic 1951 science-fiction flick about two visitors from a galaxy far, far away who want us to give peace a chance... or else. rural Pennsylvania. To sweeten the deal, this particular choo-choo happens to be laden with hazardous chemicals, prompting Rosario Dawson's railroad manager to describe it as "a missile the size of the Chrysler building!" Lucky for us, a couple hundred miles down the line we've got a grizzled conductor (Denzel Washington) and his rookie partner (Chris Pine) on what was supposed to be a routine assignment. What makes this film such fun is that there's no villain, just a one-thing-after-another series of logistical problems. Unstoppable's clean narrative lines lock Scott into a scenario where his usual restless camera style can't shake the production, even though the guy apparently has never found a scene that he couldn't shoot from a swooping helicopter. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Waiting for "Superman" ★★★ An Inconvenient Truth director Davis Guggenheim really wants to depress you. As if chronicling the impending end of the world wasn't enough, Guggenheim now sets his sights on our country's troubled public-school system with predictably dire conclusions. Slapping a giant "kick me" sign on the back of powerful teachers' unions, Waiting for "Superman" follows a handful of promising inner-city kids hoping to make the lottery for their local, thriving charter schools. I won't pretend that I'm knowledgeable enough on the subject to gauge the veracity of Guggenheim's blanket assertions, and I'm fully willing to admit that he's overlooking larger issues like systemic poverty and obvious societal inequities. But all that said, the film remains a deeply moving experience. How does your heart not break while watching the fates of children surrendered to a random drawing? (At Kendall Square, West Newton.)

You Will Meet a Tall Dark Stranger ★ ½ Another of Woody Allen's annual exercises limps into theaters, full of moneyed infidelity, old jazz standards and rote pessimism. It's tempting to just cut-and-paste from my previous reviews of Allen's late-career output, as that seems to be how he writes his screenplays these days. A recycled recitation of the filmmaker's pet themes, You Will Meet a Tall Dark Stranger has all the verve of a contractual obligation. Anthony Hopkins (himself no stranger to half-assing his way through movies) stars as a rich London lout who, spooked by contemplations of mortality, starts going to tanning salons. He quickly takes up with a gold-digging prostitute half his age, leaving his wife to seek the solace of a fortune teller. Meanwhile Naomi Watts and Josh Brolin go through some marital woes of their own, leading to familiar Woody rants about the meaninglessness of life in a godless existence. At least he used to throw in some jokes. (At Stuart Street Playhouse, West Newton and in the suburbs.)

Ghostland Observatory animates the beat and the offbeat.

Ghostland Observatory plays Royale on Dec. 15.

GHOSTLAND OBSERVATORY isn't for everyone—and that's just the way Austin's flamboyant, electro-rock duo likes it.

"We didn't start Ghostland to be some safe, mediocre, under-the-radar indie band," says keyboardist/drummer/producer Thomas Ross Turner, who has provided the ying to frontman Aaron Behrens' yang since the group broke out of Texas seven years ago.

"Aaron was wearing tight pink pants and pigtails, I was wearing a cape, and he's dancing around and making gyrations with his pelvic muscles," Turner says, recalling one early gig in New Jersey. "It looked like a bar full of lumberjacks and sailors, and they weren't happy about what was going on onstage. But that was the kind of reaction we wanted. We wanted people to look shocked and sickened, or screaming and having the best time ever. So it's cool that it's still kinda working out that way."

Only now the scale has grown larger—and tipped in Ghostland's favor, driven by wild, laser-choreographed live sets at fancier clubs and major festivals. "There's a good energy in the crowd," says Turner, 31, before a show in Spokane, Wash. "There's a lot of smiling faces and dancing and sweating. Most of the people who aren't into that don't go."

To some degree, it recalls the raves that Turner promoted in his midteens. "It wasn't the spotlight so much on the DJ; it's the music and whatever lights and ambiance you created for the party," he says. "That was how you sold tickets for your next one."

Classically trained as a child, Turner began crafting his own electronic music, inspired by how Daft Punk transformed the raw punch of house and techno for a wider audience. He found a foil in Behrens, who patterned himself after "great entertainers like Freddie Mercury and Prince and James Brown," Turner says.

"Guys who had a real character about them and really had a presence onstage."

Ghostland began playing small venues with conventional lighting "in front of five people, wherever we could get a gig," Turner recalls. But he applied his rave-honed mindset for building a buzz.

"Instead of keeping the same small show and making more money, we said, 'Let's just freaking blow all the money on the craziest show we can think of.'" It was a strategy Ghostland took to heart when the duo preceded Bob Dylan on the big stage at the 2007 Austin City Limits Festival. "We'd spend our whole budget on just lasers or lights or whatever to make it super-cool."

Musically, the duo has built some cool sounds along the way as well, though Ghostland cut back the busy layers for its fourth album, Codename: Rondo, recorded in Turner's home studio.

"This record sounds sonically better to me than any we've done," Turner says, though he's still fond of the group's 2005 debut delete.delete.i.eat.meat. "We said, 'Let's just go back and pretend we're making a record for the first time again. Let's encourage experimentation and strip it down and let there be dynamics.'"

Codename: Rondo has nothing to do with Boston basketball star Rajon Rondo, though Turner admits to cheering for the Celtics when they won the 2008 NBA championship. Instead, the title track finds Behrens trading his frisky whine for a near-spoken, tongue-in-cheek tale of a homoerotic hookup involving a guy named Jim, a red pickup truck and the "Slurpee station."

Turner calls it a "nice little story that not too many people can understand," inspired by people-watching in Newark.

The duo clearly appreciates offbeat characters and reflects that outlook onstage, where Behrens usually struts around in sunglasses and long braids. "This tour, he's been just wearing the hair down," Turner says as Ghostland heads for Royale on Dec. 15. "He's been getting a little more raw and animalistic."

Sounds like something the guys at the Slurpee station might like. ✖✖✖

Well-Suited

Say It Is So Indie nerd-icons Weezer burst onto the alternative rock scene in the early '90s with catchy riffs and irreverent sing-alongs about sweaters and Buddy Holly. They continue to turn their smarts and sass into golden melodies (and platinum records). Now Rivers Cuomo and company pay tribute to their early rock anthems with a "Memories" tour. Hear the Blue album in its entirety on Dec. 14 and the once-panned, now-acclaimed Pinkerton on Dec. 15 at the Orpheum Theatre.

Man Off the Moon

Space Oddity It's a tough life for a moon man trapped in a landscape of corporate greed and Coca-Cola ads. Scott Listfield's paintings of a lonely astronaut wandering the streets in a not-too-distant future combine images of commercialism, pop culture and modern living to offer a comical and ironic critique of today's society and values. Listfield's works are on exhibit at Laconia Gallery, Dec. 3–Jan. 29. Johanna Kaiser

HOUSE OF MIRTH

Husbands Add at Least 10 Pounds

If I were one of the ladies dedicated to restoring Edith Wharton's historic home in Lenox, I'd sell T-shirts that read, "I got mounted at the Mount."

Fortunately, the Boston Committee of the Edith Wharton Restoration at the Mount had a much better, infinitely more tasteful idea. It hosted an evening at the Chilton Club that featured a reading of Wharton's short story "The Mission of Jane" by two of Boston's finest actors, Karen MacDonald and Paula Plum (in drag), preceded by never-ending hors d'oeuvres and followed by a surprisingly delicious dinner.

The comme il faut crowd included the likes of iconoclastic thoroughbred Sylvia Pope, the highly cultured Bea and Jane Roy, le maîtresse of Mount Vernon Street Suki de Braganca, the Nefertiti of Newtonville Martha Volpe, and the righteous Reverend Barbara Nielsen (who's usually in Palm Beach by this time of year).

The evening's most Wharton-like moment: a guest saying, "You look great," to which the compliment's receiver replied, "I guess divorce looks good on me."

Sex Sells

Everyone's mad about Mad Men. How else to explain the Rogerson Communities 150th anniversary gala at the Fairmont Copley Plaza, where advertising mogul Jack Connors was honored, and a cadre of prominent hotties were made up to look like the midcentury minxes on the show? Present and accounted for: diamond dealer Donna DePrisco, kabuki socialite Marilyn Riseman, diminutive stick of dynamite Emily Rooney, banking behemoth Joe Campanelli and the flawless Carolyn, über-do-gooder Don Rodman, the formidable Britt D'Arbeloff, plus a gazillionaire who said, "I spent 17,000 f@#*ing dollars in a charity auction last night for Lady Gaga tickets," and a woman who said, "Just like my husband, staring over everybody's shoulder to see if anybody more important is there."

However, the party's best exchange took place when one of the Mad Men fembots said, "I feel like a tranny hooker," to which a friend responded, "Go stand next to Marilyn, and you'll look like you're not wearing any makeup at all."

Joanna Humphrey at the Rogerson Communities gala

Ron Ansin at WBUR's 60th anniversary gala

Zero Percent Fat

Room to Grow describes both the charity and the dinner at its gala, which left a few guests complaining that they were still hungry as they exited the Park Plaza Castle. If you're giving money to a charity, though, wouldn't you rather see it go to the cause than to the caterer? (In a similar vein, tasteful notices announced that dispensing with valet parking had saved $10,000.) And the wine flowed freely enough. The evening also offered a visual feast in the form of imaginative decor and Uma Thurman. The tragically gorgeous actress (a board member) mixed and mingled with the likes of Fenway sachem Theo Epstein and his wife, Marie Whitney, his twin brother, Paul, and his wife, Saskia (the charity's head honcha), emcee Mary Richardson, catalogue-ready couples Jeff and Nicole Bellows, Robin and Tripp Jones, and Lei-Ann and Ryan Field, and equally sparkly others.

Best silent-auction item: doubles tennis with the Epstein twins. Best line of the evening: an award-winning TV journalist joking: "Tyngsboro? I'd only go there on assignment, like maybe a fire."

All Things Considered

With so many recognizable voices from NPR, walking the ballroom of the Seaport Hotel at WBUR's 60th anniversary gala sounded like driving the length of Vermont. The days of tote bags and coffee mugs are over; the silent auction had prizes like a week at Ron Ansin's house on Mykonos and fencing lessons for two, while the live auction included $15,000 worth of landscaping and lunch with Click and Clack. Other on-air talent on hand: the stunning Robin Young, both Bobs—Littlefield and Oakes—and NPR White House correspondent Ari Shapiro (a younger, hotter Anderson Cooper who also sings in the band Pink Martini). Then there were heavy hitters like real estate titan Don Chiofaro, power couple Michael Winter and Deb Goldberg, enlightened crusader John Rosenthal, newlyweds Ted and Ella Saunders, the unsinkable Mary Kakas, and Quinn Ferree from the band Indobox.

Overheard when a pair of distinguished gentlemen discovered the bar was beer and wine only: "You'd think after giving as much money as you have, they could at least get you a glass of Scotch." ✖✖✖

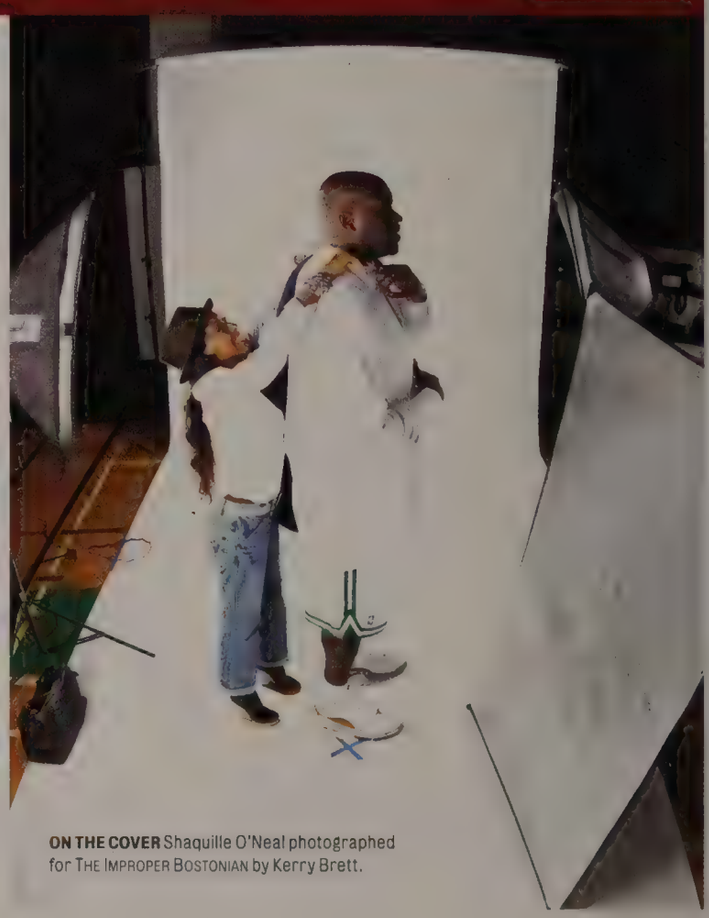
Don't Look Back



New Year's is a time when people like to step away from the sucking vortex of daily routine to reflect on life, relationships and the soiled, itchy fabric of their souls. This is a terrible idea, on par with showing up in an airport security line wearing nothing but Semtex. I don't need a special occasion to be reminded that I'm selfish and emotionally stunted. I've got friends, family and legal advisors for that.

But then, I lost my moral compass in 1987, in an incident involving a pack of menthol cigarettes, a bus shelter and a girl named Tanya. In an ironic twist, I now have so many children and godchildren that people are always asking me to deliver spiritual guidance, preferably scribbled in birthday cards or on the bottom of checks. It's an absurd request. I have the religious insight of a wet sneeze. So I usually just say: Play nice or you'll get a thunderbolt, and I like my offerings medium-rare, not burnt. Now go forth and smite the Hittites.

New Year's is also a time to contemplate one's snowballing decrepitude. It's for noticing the deeper etchings under the eyes, the surprising wad of hair in the drain, the surging interest in golf and xenophobia. Time's winged chariot does a drive-by on us all, even on famous sports stars. In this issue, Michael Holley meets Shaq as he reflects on his new town, his image and his legacy. And, as a further reminder of mortality, Ezra gets the stuffing kicked out of him by a black belt. Better file your column on time next issue, Mr. Dyer.

HUMP DAY

SHE MAY NOT BE much good at passing through the eye of a needle, but this camel has other talents. She performs up to four times per day in the Radio City Christmas Spectacular's "live nativity" scene where she walks across the stage while maintaining a stately composure. "The camels have never done anything crazy backstage," says Alina Williams, a veteran Rockette. "One year we had a cranky sheep." As befitting their desert heritage, the show camels live in a heated tent. "They are treated like the stars they are." ANDREW RIMAS

For What Eels You

Christmas Eve rituals should be hereditary, and chef Dante De Magistris prepares a Feast of the Seven Fishes according to the recipes he grew up cooking with his nonna. The antipasto is a spread that includes wood-grilled eel, baccalà salad, and a chilled octopus and potato salad freshened with wild celery leaves harvested from his aunt's garden.

ELIZABETH BOMZE

Wine

ENVELOPE, PLEASE

I'm consistently amazed at wine's wide spectrum of quality. At year's end, I compare the good against the good, to find the truly great—the wines of transcendent merit. Here are the awards for best picks of the year.

MASTER OF WINE SANDY BLOCK IS VICE PRESIDENT OF BEVERAGE OPERATIONS FOR LEGAL SEA FOODS.

The "It Comes From Where?" Award HERMANN J. WIEMER DRY RIESLING, FINGER LAKES, 2008 ($22, WINESTONE, CHESTNUT HILL)

Upstate New York? Trust me, although don't trust the label. This isn't "dry," it's proof of how good riesling from the frozen tundra of New York can be.

The "I Like Chard, but I Don't Like Oak" Award FOLEY "STEEL" CHARDONNAY, SANTA BARBARA, 2009 ($32, THE URBAN GRAPE, CHESTNUT HILL)

Very simple: They make it without any aging in barrels. Oak junkies will swear the Foleys are lying, and normal people will like it, too.

The "It Tastes French but Isn't" Award [illegible] HEIGHTS ESTATE CHARDONNAY, WILLAMETTE VALLEY, 2008 ($28, WINE CASK, SOMERVILLE)

A creamy, subtle, ultra-dry chardonnay. American material with French tailoring.

The "Ridiculously Good With Raw Shellfish" Award DOMAINE DE LA FÉPIÈRE "CLOS DES BRIORDS" MUSCADET, 2009 ($17.50, VINO DIVINO, NEWTON)

Shiveringly bone-dry, this is your basic good-vibe wine.

The "I've Got a Sweet Tooth but Won't Drink White Zin" Award [illegible]

This is heaven in a glass, a divine nectar of such shimmering precision and agreeability that it's almost a sin to drink now. Tastes of honey, pear and mineral.

The "How Do the Italians Do This for $15?" Award FUMANELLI VALPOLICELLA CLASSICO, 2009 ($15, V. CIRACE & SON, BOSTON)

When I tasted this, my first reaction was: I wasn't born yesterday—this can't possibly cost less than $20. I was wrong. It's a luscious cherry-filled fruit bomb, but with some earthy richness to it.

The "Merlot Can't Possibly Be This Good, I Saw the Movie" Award SHAFER VINEYARDS MERLOT, NAPA VALLEY, 2007 ($54, GORDON'S, WALTHAM)

Hollywood lies! This is a world-class grape when done right, and the Shafer family from Stags Leap in Napa are on top of it.

The "Chardonnay Substitute for Those Embarrassed to Drink Chardonnay" Award TERLANO PINOT BIANCO, ALTO ADIGE, 2009 ($13, SELECT LIQUORS, ALLSTON)

This one is a dead ringer, but it's a bit milder and mellower than chard, with a touch of spice and a lush, soft texture.

The "I Finally Found a Great Grüner" Award PICHLER GRÜNER VELTLINER FEDERSPIEL, AUSTRIA, 2008 ($28, BAZAAR, ALLSTON)

This underground cult grape should mostly stay underground as far as I'm concerned, but this one's a stunner. Thick and rich, with beautiful energetic fruit.

The "Time-Sensitive Single-Best Category of Wine to Buy Blindly" Award [illegible]

It's a once-in-a-blue-moon vintage for this underrated category. If you like red wine, but you don't crave massive tannins, the '09 Beaujolais harvest is a dream come true. Ultra-ripe and red-berry-like, it goes down so easy.

The "Run Don't Walk, Because There's Not Much Left" Award LAURENT-PERRIER CHAMPAGNE, 2000 (REQUEST FROM YOUR RETAILER, SHOULD BE $60)

A 10-year-old Champagne from a great producer, it walks the tightrope between power and finesse. This is a "wow" wine that somehow got lost in the shuffle.

The "I've Got to Impress My Boss, but I Can't Spend More Than $50" Award TURLEY MEAD [illegible], ATLAS PEAK, 2007 ($40, AVAILABLE FROM WINERY MAILING LIST)

Impressive. Not much else to be said, except spectacular, mind-boggling, over the top.

The "Best Winery Nobody Ever Heard Of" Award: PEGASUS [illegible], WAIPARA, NEW ZEALAND

Tucked away in a corner of South Island, everything Pegasus Bay does is good: chardonnay, pinot noir, riesling, the whole nine yards.

The "Lifetime Achievement" Award CLOUDY BAY, MARLBOROUGH, NEW ZEALAND

It launched New Zealand's reputation 20 years ago, and it's still the leader in terms of quality, image and style. The definition of sauvignon blanc and quintessential pinot noir.

Going Out

Tequila Rising

Fort Point may have its sights set on becoming the city's new high-end dining destination, but for Chris Damian, it feels like home. At Papagãyo, the Mexican outpost and tequila bar he launched in late November, the goal is approachability. "I lived in the Seaport for a long time," says Damian. "I've seen this area grow, they could use a restaurant like this."

Transforming the space that once housed the concept-heavy Achilles Project/Persephone boutique/restaurant mashup required extensive renovation, knocking down walls and lengthening the bar. Behind the counter, a Cold-stone-style block will be used to keep tequila chilled. Admits Damian, "It's still a work in progress."

"I'VE SEEN THIS AREA GROW, THEY COULD USE A RESTAURANT LIKE THIS."

Some of the industrial design for which Achilles was lauded remains intact, but the once-stark walls are now vibrant with works by local artists. A life-size image of a mariachi band adheres to an expansive mirror, a kitschy supplement for the lack of live music.

The reputation of Mexican food in Boston is dicey, but Damian isn't worried. He was the original chef at Harvard Square's Border Cafe, before going on to launch Scollay Square, Tavern on the Water and a slew of Max & Dylans. As soon as the paint dries on Papagãyo, he and partner Brad Dalbeck will open Andiamo in Charlestown, bringing their empire up to six spots, plus a catering company. The Papagãyo menu is a smart mix of high and low, with standards like tacos ($7.95) or "fresh hacked" guacamole ($8.95) and more adventurous offerings like braised short-rib taquizas ($18.95) or tuna ceviche ($9.95), shaved tableside.

Patrons are greeted by a statue of Marilyn Monroe in The Seven Year Itch, painted to look like a south-of-the-border sex kitten. "She was in a friend's basement," he laughs. "I thought, why the hell not? She's unique." You won't find that a few blocks over at Menton, but then again, you won't find tequila-spiked snow cones ($12) there, either. Coming in pineapple, prickly pear, watermelon and orange flavors, they provide sweet validation for the trek.

Impersonals

COLD FRONT

TO THE WORST LANDLORD IN HISTORY: Paper-thin walls, perpetually leaking faucets and the occasional roach might be enough to scare some tenants away from an apartment after just a few days, but we thought that the prime location was worth the hiccups. While all those things were manageable, conveniently losing heat as soon as the temperature dropped was not. And neither is ignoring phone calls from rent-paying tenants, or lying and saying that problems are fixed when they aren't. At least this experience has brought my roommates together: We have to huddle for warmth.

Frosty in Brookline

To the female pedestrian crossing against a red light in Washington Square on Friday:

You are a moron. I had the right of way, not you, and you still decided to cuss me out. Seriously? When you do that in the future, it'd be a good idea to look to see if any cars are approaching. Or don't, and maybe you'll get run over. It's your choice.

Peeved driver

To all the men out there:

If you go to a bar or party and meet a girl that you want to go home with, please only follow through if you think you can get it up. If you have too much to drink, don't do it. Make up an excuse and leave. There's nothing worse than going home with a guy you find attractive and being severely disappointed when his tool has no batteries. If you're going to talk the talk, you need to walk the walk.

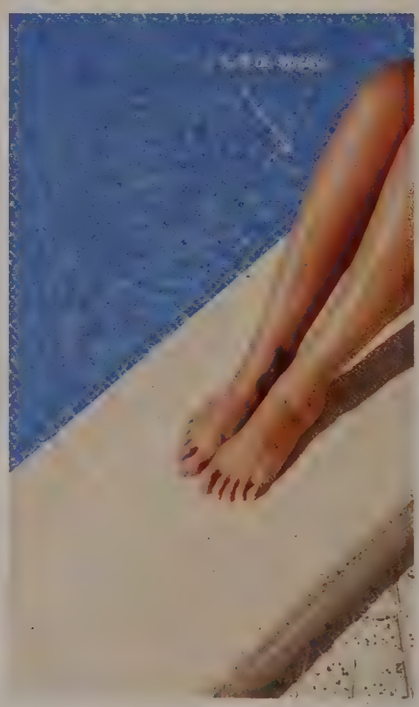
Drink of the Moment

'Tis the Seasoning

Mistral's new ALLSPICE SOUR ($11) alludes to the standard whiskey sour and hints at the historic Ward Eight. "It's a take on a classic, like so many drinks are these days," says beverage manager Dave Borsman.

But there's still room for free thinking. Inspired by a Boston Center for Adult Education class he led on wintry refreshments, like mulled wine and spiced cider, Borsman took to the kitchen to bring similar flavors into this seasonal offering. "These days you have to incorporate elements besides what's on the bar that can make a drink singularly yours," he explains.

Borsman uses a simple syrup infused with vanilla and toasted cinnamon, nutmeg and allspice. The flavor melds with two ounces of bourbon and balances out the acidic notes of orange and lemon juices. (Borsman plans to incorporate winter citrus like blood orange and Meyer lemon soon.) With a float of orange oil and Angostura, the Allspice Sour is a drink of layers, bitter and citric, earthy and sweet. It's winter and spring in a tumble, a seasonal drink looking toward brighter days.



NICK ALTSCHULLER

Beauty

Got to Glow

As if I'm not pale enough, my skin turns a lovely shade of translucence during winter months. To nip that in the bud, I went to G2O for its latest remedy: the Spa Tan package ($125), a full-body cranberry-sugar-scrub exfoliation, followed by a Swiss shower and a spray-tan treatment. (Dead skin cells are the root of those funky spray-tan lines, so I was happy to be properly prepped. But if you want to skip this step be sure to scrub beforehand.) Once I was smooth, my technician helped me choose the right tone on the VersaSpa machine. Like a futuristic time capsule (it even talks), you're told to move in three different positions as two jets move up and down, spraying your body and face evenly with a moisturizing, quick-drying mist. In just five minutes, I was able to put my clothes back on over a natural, beachy glow.

WHAT'S IN STORE

Improper style & beauty editor Amanda Knorr is an expert shopper, and now she's turned entrepreneur. Spreedia.com is Knorr's new web start-up, allowing users to virtually visit about 100 boutiques in Boston and Cambridge [Ed: Did we mention Amanda works here? Better mention it again.] You can search the site by category (shoes, vintage, etc.), location and by how much you want to spend, while an interactive map, blog and events calendar offer insider tips on sales and trunk shows. But it isn't all fashion and housewares. "The boutiques featured on the site are my edited selection," says Knorr. "But I didn't only pick stores I would shop at—there's a store on here for everyone."

The Value of Pie

By the number of Aussie transplants huddled over the meat pies and sausage rolls, seems there's a huge demand in this city for Down Under staples. That's why Sam Jackson opened KO Catering and Pies, a pint-sized South Boston food shop (formerly St. Alphonzo's Kitchen). After four years in the Hub with nary a bite of flaky, savory pastries (with fillings like Irish beef stew), vegemite-slathered toast or chicken salt–flavored fries, Jackson's hankering for a taste of home was all the motivation he needed to get rolling. ELIZABETH BOMZE

THE LIST

Louis DiBiccari, chef de cuisine at Sel de la Terre Back Bay, predicts 2011's food trends.

1. BURGERS SLIM DOWN INTO FLAT PATTY FORM
2. UNUSUAL CHEESE PAIRINGS WITH CHOCOLATE, HONEY OR SMOKED FISH
3. TO-GO MENUS START TO INCORPORATE MORE SMALL BITE OPTIONS
4. EVEN MORE GLUTEN-FREE MENUS
5. THE BACK BAY ANGLES TO BE TAKEN MORE SERIOUSLY AS A RESTAURANT DESTINATION
6. MORE RESTAURANTS WILL OFFER EXPERIENCE DINING AND/OR COOKING CLASSES

WAY DOWN SOUTHIE

Local 149 works to feed Citypoint.

DOES SOUTH BOSTON NEED a new neighborhood pub? "Need" might not be the word, but "want" is another matter, given the details behind the forthcoming Local 149. Co-owner Jason Owens of Newton's Biltmore Bar & Grille is opening the eatery on the site of the former Farragut House at 149 P Street (and no, the name Local P was never in the running). This will make it the only sit-down restaurant in the Citypoint section. Owens promises a long beer list, craft cocktails and an extensive selection of farmstead cheeses and house-cured meats. The menu will showcase Woodbury's oysters, Captain Marden's seafood and, most likely, the Biltmore's signature hog wings.

LOCAL BOY Jason Owens

BYE-BYE, PIE: After three years, Pie Bakery and Café has closed its doors in Newton Centre. The owners, however, will open a neighborhood-style, midpriced restaurant in the same location come January. "We have a full liquor license, which is awesome," says owner Elli Kaplansky of the forthcoming B Street Restaurant and Bar. Look for a casual, American-food-themed menu for lunch, dinner and brunch.

TICO TEASER: Michael Schlow's upcoming Back Bay venture will feature photographs taken by the chef himself. Other decor will include lots of reclaimed wood, a chef's table and an outdoor courtyard with a fireplace. All this in the former Cottonwood Café space, with an opening set for (maybe) January.

MARK YOUR CALENDAR: Tremont 647 will briefly close for renovations in early January, reopening with a new menu about a week later. While the work is being done, the plan is for its sibling, Sister Sorel, to remain open.

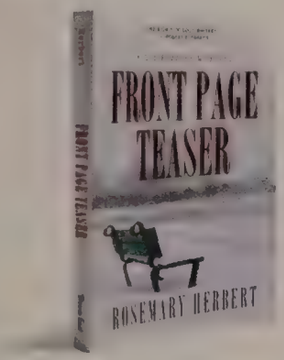
A missing mom, scary cookie dough and the days before 9/11



ELLEN JOHANSSON LIVES A conventionally tame life with her husband and daughter. When she disappears from her Newton home, leaving only blood-stained cookie dough, Beantown Banner journalist Liz Higgins gets on the case. Mixing sleuthing with her reporting, Liz develops a questionable friendship with Ellen's daughter and husband. Add Ellen's pen-pal relationship with a Palestinian woman, Nadia, which culminates in a rapturous meeting in NYC during the Time-That-Didn't-Realize-It-Was-Still-Innocent, just before 9/11. A scene in the intact World Trade Center brings a shiver.

Liz pursues clues from New York to Somerville to Fiji. She also explores Ellen's past, when creepy sexual abuse may have occurred in a Wellesley campus garden. A New York taxi driver's mysterious Arabic utterances, spoken with Ellen in the backseat, resonate ominously during this tense time.

Further complications include Liz's two admirers: Tom, a likable, down-home guy in the billboard business, and Cormack Kinnaird, an educated, slightly pretentious and elusively romantic forensics expert.

Herbert gives us respectfully drawn Middle Eastern characters, marvelously raw taxi dispatchers and well-spoken suburbanites. ✖✖✖

FROM PAGE 62: "Stereotypes! Ellen thought as she stood on the curbside by the World Trade Center. 'Here I am feeling bad about any prejudice I might be feeling, and, all the while, that cabbie is making assumptions about me. Just because I'm a blonde, it doesn't mean I'm stupid. Well, I showed him,' she thought to herself smiling.

Looking at her watch, she realized the cabbie had been a good one. She was early for her date. There was enough time to document the occasion in photographs. Taking out her camera, she pointed it at the towers, only to realize immediately they were too large to frame in her lens."

DOUBLE DOWN

Deuxave feels like a winner.

COMBO PLATTER Duck breast with foie-gras-stuffed prunes and a dining room with a view

BRIAN PICCINI AND CO-OWNER chef Christopher Coombs are obviously contrarians. Why else would they insist that the name of their restaurant be pronounced without the liaison that makes the X in deux sound like a Z. They're contrarians as well in their refusal to be deterred from opening Deuxave at a location that has seen eatery after eatery fail. Their audacity should be rewarded, for they've created a superb restaurant that offers well-executed dishes in a stunningly appointed space and at prices that represent très bon rapport prix-qualité.

Inside, floor-to-ceiling windows look out on the civilized vistas of Comm. and Mass. Aves. A 12-stool bar and cocktail nook follow the elegant curve of the building's south side.

I enjoyed crusty rolls from Iggy's and Echire butter from Normandy while reading the wine list. We selected glasses of 2009 Clifford sauvignon blanc from New Zealand, marked with characteristic grapefruit notes, and a 2009 Falesco sangiovese from Umbria (both $8 for generous pours). By the bottle, I indulged my penchant for malbec, choosing a well-structured 2008 Zuccardi from Argentina ($40).

A flavorful duck confit ($14) arrived on a bed of white beans, with a cranberry coulis whose tartness complemented the richness of the duck. A plate of roasted beets ($11), gold, pink and purple, offered a sweetness to contrast the robust Laura Chenel goat cheese. An intensely full-bodied beef stock distinguished the "9 hour" onion soup ($10), thick with caramelized onions and made thicker with gobs of Comté cheese. The most aesthetic first course, a duet of prime-beef tartare and Wagyu carpaccio ($14), brought a photogenic array of ultra-thin slices of raw beef alongside a small hexahedron of tenderloin chopped with shallots, anchovies, garlic, capers, mustard, olive oil and parsley bound together with quail egg yolk. Sharing the plate with this tour de force was a potato gaufrette, chanterelles and sliced cornichons.

From the list of mains we picked the gnocchi ($23) as a pasta course. These feathery light pillows of potato came with roasted cauliflower and Brussels sprouts, a generous scattering of porcini mushrooms and a crisped farm egg, the yolk of which enriched the sage-butter sauce.

After this delicious interlude, we moved on to the fish and meat, starting with seared local diver scallops ($28). Perfectly cooked to seal in their moist, satiny texture, they arrived on a fondue of sweet-savory leeks and parsley studded with mildly salty lardoons. A crispy fried patty of rosti potatoes and a confit of tomato arrived alongside, while a shaving of black truffles added aroma. These disparate ingredients coexisted splendidly, and only the gingered-carrot emulsion seemed over the top. Another duet, this time of roasted Giannone chicken ($22), consisted of a breast with golden-hued skin and thigh meat formed into a crépinette with a touch of cumin. The resilient texture of sautéed, slivered black-trumpet mushrooms contrasted nicely with the accompanying creamy polenta made from locally sourced Silver Queen corn.

French onion soup

Duck confit

Saddle of lamb

Tiramisu

The last two main courses rivaled the carpaccio for presentation honors. Slices of tender, rare duck breast ($28) appeared on a bed of lentils surrounded with "French kisses"—prunes stuffed with foie gras—and baby turnips in a mild sauce Robert. Thick slices of tender Moroccan-spiced lamb saddle ($29) lay on a bed of Persian tabbouleh, with baby carrots, minted raita and roasted red peppers as additional garnishes.

For dessert, the crème brûlée ($10), flavored with coconut, was pleasant enough, except for the "espresso amoretti" cookies, which were dreadful. The mocha tiramisu ($13), on the other hand, blew us away. Deconstructed into two chocolate-covered cylinders of Marsala mascarpone cream with a dollop of espresso mousse and an espresso-soaked ladyfinger, the dish looked and tasted sublime.

As long as Deuxave keeps up this level of performance, the owners can pronounce the name any way they please. ×××

Ez Sez {EZRA DYER}

A LITTLE ASSISTANCE

Ezra needs an intern.

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

PEOPLE WHO HAVE assistants are typically high-powered, type-A, ruthless corporate titans. "Talk to my assistant." "Make an appointment with my assistant." "How did you get past my assistant?" These are the kinds of statements I'm used to hearing, although I've never issued them myself. But I'll say it now: I need an assistant.

Lately, the tornado of life has been spinning my Dorothy of details into the Kansas of neglect. Obviously I need more free time—time to concentrate on writing great sentences like that last one. But right now, my precious brainpower is consumed with small tasks that are, frankly, below me. Like not forgetting my Kindle on a plane, for instance.

Loyal readers of this column may recall that I recently got a Kindle. Nearly as quickly, I lost a Kindle. Because it's electronic, you've got to turn it off when a plane is landing. And because it's so slim, it's very easy to forget in the seat-back pocket of a United flight to San Francisco. All ended well, as I was re-United with my Kindle the next day. But all of that stress and heartache and minutes on the phone could've been avoided if I had someone to look after me. Someone who realizes that since my brain is full of big ideas, the little ones often get squeezed out.

I'm still working on sending out gifts for weddings from 2009. I have a backlog of incomplete thank-you cards dating to last summer. A mirror in our downstairs vanity fell, and I have no idea how to fix it. Someone hacked my website and shut it down. This means that some random geek put more effort into shutting down my site than I do into running it, but I'm just glad someone cares.

These are the kinds of situations where it'd be handy to have an assistant. Or an intern. Though I think The Improper said I couldn't have an intern. Or was it the courts? I'm so bad with details. See, this is why I need an intern.

So what's in it for you? Let's face it, kids: You're not getting a job without some experience. Actually, you're probably not getting a job, period. But experience can't hurt! At the very least, you'll learn important things about the publishing industry, like how I take my shirts from the dry cleaner (no starch).

Little-known fact: Due to cutbacks in the business, many newspapers and magazines are now entirely written by unpaid interns. Not this one, though, and certainly not this column. Which I've got to wrap up soon, so I can get back to my dorm and drink Four Loko—I mean, get back to my house, because I'm an old writer guy and definitely not a sophomore at BU named Cody who works in a cage at The Improper offices.

Anyhow, as my servan—I mean, as my assistant—you'll have to conform to my schedule, which means you'll have to come to my house. I live in Quincy. I don't want to name-drop, but so did the Craigslist Killer. It's not all glitz and glamour, though. This can be a hard city, a place where fortunes are made and lost in the blink of a Keno game. You've got to understand that if you come here every day, the Q will change you. Many a starry-eyed dreamer took exit 12 only to discover the fantasies of fame and riches denied by the metaphorical traffic jam of the Neponset Bridge construction. That and the literal traffic jam caused by the Neponset Bridge construction.

As the expression goes, it beats digging ditches. Why do I need ditches? Never question me! You're fired.

So what does this job pay? Well, you can't put a price on happiness. Which is good, because you'll definitely be unhappy. But as the expression goes, it beats digging ditches. And you'll learn the truth in that, after you finish digging my new ditches. Why do I need ditches, you say? Never question me! You're fired.

Applications must be accompanied by references, preferably to my favorite scenes from Billy Madison. Priority given to applicants with experience in aluminum smelting (you'll see). Applicant must be able to wear a Bluetooth headset while looking nervous and walking several paces behind me. Candidate should have strong tolerance for despair. Be aware that résumés that include adverbs will be thrown away immediately. Salary negotiable, but it's zero. Look at it this way—you're getting in on the ground floor. Of a ranch. But that's better than the basement of a skyscraper.

Right now, kid, you're still green. But that'll wash off once you're done pretending to be Godzilla for my amusement. Why, yes, of course there's copper in that paint. Quit complaining. You sound just like Cody. ✖✖✖

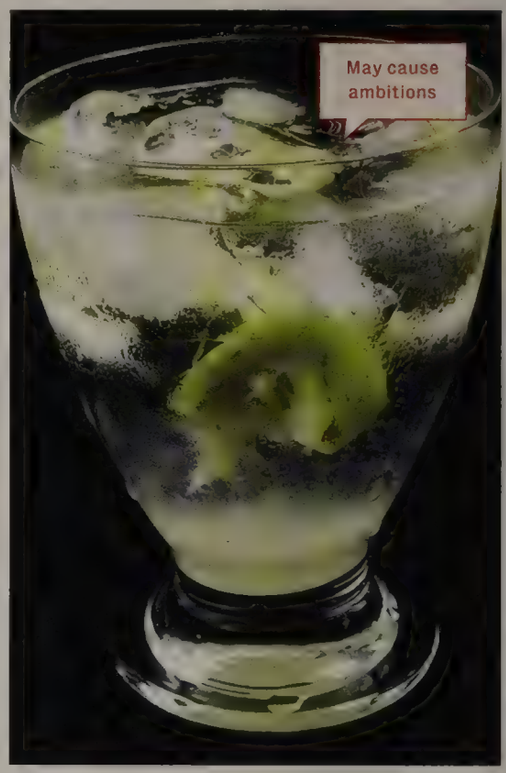
MY LITTLE LIST

Recommendations for books, drinks and dreams

FOR SOME TIME, I'VE BEEN writing an annual column about a few random reasons to smile. About things that a lot of my readers might enjoy, especially if they're quirky in their tastes.

Let's start with booze. Years ago, when I was starting my career in finance and hating it, my insurance agent asked me to stop by his house to sign some forms. He was quirky, too, for an insurance man. He was on a state agency that oversaw prisons, and he wrote whimsical poetry. I arrived at noon, and he said, "How about a drink?"

"A Bloody Mary possible?"



"Oh, no, you look a little sad. How about a happy drink for summer?" It was the end of June, and the Earth was heating up. He mixed vodka and Rose's lime juice with ice in a cocktail shaker. "I like being aggressive in the mixing," he said, shaking the concoction hard. Then he spilled it into a frosty old-fashioned glass and squeezed in a lime. "Vodka gimlet," he said. "Winston Churchill's second-favorite drink. The first being Johnnie Walker Red."

Well-oiled when I left, I fantasized about what I really wanted to be in life: a psychiatrist. I drove straight to my grandfather's house in back of Boston College. He had entertained my wild schemes in the past, and I was going to ask him to lend me money to go to medical school and eventually become a shrink. He listened to my story and said, "Everyone can be a romantic after a few drinks. When you wake up tomorrow, you'll say to yourself, 'I couldn't pass second-year algebra in high school, how the hell am I going to pass calculus or organic chemistry?'" I had a Toll House cookie and a glass of milk, hugged Grandpa and left.

In the money game I still get to be an amateur shrink. Here's the recipe for Via Matta's great gimlet:

2 ½ ounces of Tito's vodka
1 ounce fresh lime juice
1 ounce simple syrup
A bunch of fresh basil

Shake it with ice in a cocktail shaker. Serve it straight up. This should make you fantasize about med school, or better, dream about something really romantic.

Shorter bites of what I've enjoyed this year include the eclectic offerings of Peter DuBois, creative director at the Huntington Theatre. How many people do you meet who immediately make you smile? Perhaps it's that he moved here from Alaska to escape Sarah Palin. Peter is a merry man with a serious soul.

"My mom was a librarian in a seminary," he told me. "She took me to a musical production there when I was seven or eight. Believe it or not, it was Fiddler on the Roof, with priests playing all the roles. To see priests as Tevye and his wife in bed explaining to each other about their daughter's forbidden love was priceless. It hooked me on the theater, all the make-believe and the absurdity of life. Priests as a married Jewish couple." DuBois' top choices in the theatre include The Winter's Tale, Angels in America and, for musicals, Gypsy and A Chorus Line. The man is as passionate about drama as Tom Menino is about this city and Malcolm Rogers is about his MFA. Go see his Vengeance Is the Lord's this month.

On the literary side, I loved the newest James Lee Burke novel, The Glass Rainbow. It's a thriller from the lushest painter of good and evil around. Like most of Burke's books, it's set in and around New Orleans. Eat some gumbo and wash it down with a shot of Jack and a beer back.

Our immersion in Afghanistan made me dip back into one of the historical fiction pleasures of the last 25 years, the Flashman series by George MacDonald Fraser. Flashman is a coward and a rake, a sardonic swashbuckler who blunders into becoming a hero in almost every British campaign of the 19th century, from the Afghan Wars to the Charge of the Light Brigade, from the Russian campaigns to the Zulu War, and over to America with John Brown in the Civil War and with Custer at Little Big Horn.

Another great read is Bob Parker's final Spenser novel, Painted Ladies, which arrived at my house this week. Losing legends is both tough and sad. And who writes like this anymore?

Healy said, "You're alive, mostly through luck."

"Luck is in the residue of design," I said.

"You quoting somebody again?"

"Branch Rickey," I said.

"Jesus," Healy said. "You know stuff most people don't even care about."

Read Spenser's last hurrah and remember what we all miss so much.

Since I hear from so many of you who've actually written a novel or wanted to, I recommend George V. Higgins' out-of-print On Writing. Higgins gives budding authors incredible tips like, "Good fiction is unverified, uncensored gossip." On writing short fiction: "Use the bank robber's rule. 'Get in, get the money, get out.'" And the secret to starting a writing career: "There is no secret. The way to determine if you have talent is to rummage through your files and see if you have written anything: If you have, and quite a lot, then the chances are you have the talent to write more."

This is all from a man who wrote dozens of novels, including The Friends of Eddie Coyle, my pick for one of the best of the 20th century.

A few last quickies: Listen to Andrew Lloyd Webber's Song and Dance featuring the great Bernadette Peters. A little-known work, it has the smartest, most sardonic lyrics.

A romantic restaurant for a first date, snow job or special anniversary: the second floor of the Hungry I on Charles Street. It's like being in the middle of Europe. And you can kiss between bites with no one snooping.

Lastly, I've received many comments about my column on writing résumés. But the best hobby or special interest I've heard so far was the young man who listed "elephant polo" on his CV. Sure to get him a job.

As for latest sips, give me anything you can squeeze Meyer lemons into. Cheers. ×××

ON DRAFTS, DOC, DELONTE AND DOUGH

THE 5 MOST CRUCIAL DATES OF 2010

April 22–24: The NFL Draft I did some research (no, seriously) on the best draft classes in NFL history and emerged unimpressed. Well, I guess the four HOFers Pittsburgh grabbed in 1974 were OK, but otherwise there's nothing that compares to the potential and depth of the 2010 Patriots: McCourty, Mesko, Spikes, Deaderick, Cunningham, Gronkowski, Hernandez. And Taylor Price hasn't even played yet. Those are eight picks the Sweatshirt thankfully resisted trading.

June 25: The NHL Draft The Bruins couldn't afford to miss. Coming off the worst playoff loss in NHL history, and with the 40th anniversary of their last Cup fast approaching, they needed to turn the second pick into a home run—or, as they say in Canada, a blistering slap shot. And they did. Obviously it's early, but Tyler Seguin has the goods and should deliver for a while.

SECOND IS THE BEST Good start for Seguin

July 1: Doc Rivers Returns All the fun that the Celtics are having right now? None of that's possible if Doc doesn't decide to lace… er… Windsor knot it back up for another season. Without the coach, Ray Allen might be in New York or Miami. Shaq would probably be in Atlanta. And Delonte? I don't even want to know. As KG said many times, Doc's the glue that keeps the team together.

Oct. 7: The Moss Trade The Patriots' success can't be entirely attributed to Randy Moss' departure, but there's no denying that the move changed the trajectory of the season. In a way, it's bittersweet. He was fun to have around. But what can you do? He has issues. He was only going to get worse. And, as a fan, it's hard to really miss him when it's so obvious that the team doesn't.

Dec. 6–9: Sox Grab Adrian Gonzalez and Carl Crawford With all the money they're about to pay these guys, you wonder if Mr. Henry might force them to play striker during the offseason. Zing! But seriously, baseball is back. It's a glorious time for Red Sox Nation—as long as you weren't a huge Bill Hall fan.

1 THE ONE MOST SURREAL MOMENT OF 2010

Look at the cover of this magazine. Now take a few seconds and contemplate the fact that Shaquille O'Neal actually plays for the Boston Celtics. How weird is that? I'm pretty sure I'll be asking that question until he retires. At which point, I'll just change the verb tense.

2 NEW SUPERSTARS

On Point For all of the moronic predictions I've made over the years, my borderline obsession with Rajon Rondo (from as far back as 2007) has officially paid off. This time last year he was good, but he's now among the best. Victory! (This seems like a good time to admit that I once purchased a Gerald Green jersey and wasn't trying to be ironic.)

Next in Line I was close to giving up on Jerod Mayo. Not on the fact the he could play, but that he was destined to become one of the NFL's best. He'll be in the conversation by this year's playoffs. A conversation sure to be filled with bad condiment puns.

3 Feel-Good Stories

Old(ish) McDonald In the spring, Darnell McDonald was a 31-year-old minor-league journeyman. By the start of the summer he was a cult hero. It was somewhat short-lived, but McDonald's story was fantastic while it lasted. And we'll always have that broken windshield, DMac. Shh, always…

Little Danny Woodhead This ending has yet to be written, but I'm sure it's going to be adorable. Honestly, although people like to joke about Woodhead, the guy's now poised to have a legitimate NFL career. Through 13 weeks he had more receptions than Randy Moss—and he hardly ever breaks into emotionally unstable postgame tirades.

"For Game Point!" Delonte West's return was great for fans, who always love to cheer for him. It was great for him, because he had nowhere else to go. It was great for the team because, above all else, West can really play. And once he's healthy, the story—and hilarity—can continue.

THE 4 SADDEST DAYS OF 2010

Jan. 10: Ravens 33, Patriots 14 This wasn't the most crushing loss of the Brady/Belichick era, but probably the most embarrassing. This was the day that the Pats hit rock bottom, and you'd never imagine they'd turn it all around so quickly. I, on the other hand, saw it coming all along.

May 14: Flyers 4, Bruins 3 After Game 4, it was, "Eh, they were bound to get one." After Game 5, "Whatever, we've still got two in Boston." After Game 6, "No, no, this isn't happening." After this game… shock. What a disaster. Thank God the C's were there. They'd never let us down.

June 17: Lakers 83, Celtics 79 The Bruins' collapse was bad, but that was just the second round of the playoffs. The Celtics were up 13 points with 20 minutes left in Game 7 of the Finals. I hate to even bring it up. It still doesn't make sense. Granted, nothing about that postseason really did.

Sept. 26: Yankees 4, Red Sox 3 This was back when the Sox fooled us into thinking they might make a late-September run, before blowing the season in extra innings against the Yanks. Who cares, though? Let's talk about A-Gon and Crawford. Long live Roush Racing! Long live Liverpool! Viva la Henry!

Soroff On TOM ASHBROOK

The NPR host discusses kung fu movies, Christopher Columbus and blowing up mountains in Alaska.

HOST OF NPR'S CURRENT AFFAIRS SHOW ON POINT, Tom Ashbrook, 55, was born and raised on a farm in Illinois. After studying at Yale and Andhra University in India, he worked as a surveyor and dynamiter in the Alaskan oil fields, as a Hong Kong TV personality and as a producer of foreign editions of Chinese kung fu films. He spent 10 years as a foreign correspondent for publications like the South China Morning Post and The Boston Globe, where he rose to be deputy managing editor. The recipient of numerous awards, including a Harvard Nieman fellowship, his foray into Internet entrepreneurship led to his book, The Leap. He lives with his wife and three children in Newton.

Jonathan Soroff: How do you talk so much?
Tom Ashbrook: It's kinda hard, but you just open a vein and bleed. We do a lot of prep work, so there's a lot to talk about.

Your mind must be like a lint trap.
[Laughs.] It is, but we have a staff of about 10, and they send me out every day after the show with two big stacks of research they've put together for the next day's show, and I come home and chug it. My college education comes in handy.

Anything you miss about print journalism?
Yes. I miss being out in the world as much as I was then, and sometimes I miss the chance to really sit with a subject and distill it. On the other hand, I truly love that "in the moment" quality of radio when it's live.

How do you stop yourself from cursing?
I still have that blue-language filter from my writing days. Plus, I grew up in a household where you didn't swear.

Don't you ever feel like going berserk over a topic you're passionate about?
Sometimes you want to go bonkers, and there's plenty to go bonkers about. But there's plenty of people going bonkers these days, and I remind myself that that's not valuable.

Glenn Beck: Has he gone Colonel Kurtz?
I'm not sure what side of the river he's on, or how far up, but I do know it's not my side.

When you were a foreign correspondent, how many passports did you go through?
[Chuckles.] Dozens of pages of visas, lots of stuff stapled in there. I spent 10 years in Asia, five in Japan, and I was traveling about six months a year, as they used to say, "from Hokkaido to the Khyber Pass."

Favorite Asian cuisine?
Vietnamese. It's the perfect fusion: It has the lightness of Southeast Asia and the flavor of Chinese.

Favorite vacation spot in Asia?
We had a lot of good times in Bali. I've had spectacular times in Indonesia, the Philippines, Borneo, India. I'd love to live in India again.

Scariest experience?
I've been in the middle of some Korean riots that were pretty fierce. I had a really bizarre kidnapping in Moscow by a gypsy cab driver. Weird gunfire in the Philippines back in the Marcos era. Oh, and there was the time I went to Somalia. The ride from the airport in Mogadishu to the hotel took three cars: one in front and one in back with armed gunmen, and two in the car with me, just to go six miles.

Politician with whom you'd most like to have dinner?
Obama. I wonder what he's really thinking.

Do you think any of these really incendiary pundits believe what they say?
I think they believe part of it, and then all the money they make persuades them of the rest of it. It's a very lucrative franchise they're working. I mean, what does Rush make? $20 million a year? That can really do a job on your belief system.

Craziest or most colorful part of your career?
Blowing up mountains in Alaska was fun. I know the Earth-firsters won't like that, but it put me through college. That was sexy, in its way. The kung fu films were pretty fun. We'd sit in an abandoned film studio in Hong Kong in the middle of the night, with rats crawling up the velvet curtains, dubbing English onto these funky, backwoods kung fu films, when China was still closed. We'd just kind of make up the dialogue to fit the lip movements.

Describe your average listener.
When I came to NPR, I had a stereotype in mind. But actually, it's people who want to learn something. We actively try to broaden our listener base. We want everyone in there: Cambridge dons and truck drivers.

Looking at your demographics, your fastest expanding audience is in the South.
Isn't that great? We can put Boston together with Baton Rouge. This country needs a lot more of that, and we really want to be part of that webbing between regions and political perspectives. We want to be respectful and be open to everybody.

Most deplorable thing in American life today?
I guess the quick trigger on demeaning others. There's a very swift rush to bad-mouthing others who aren't a clone of yourself.

Is doing live radio physically demanding?
When I come out of the show, I feel like I just played a game of basketball. It's a whole-body engagement.

Moment in history you'd most liked to have witnessed?
I guess the moment Columbus stepped off the boat. I'd like to know everything I know now, and be standing on the Indians' side.

How would you describe your own politics?
Somewhere in the middle. I'm real worried about ultra-inequality in this country. I think we're on bad terrain there. At the same time, I'm a believer in the motivational power of markets. So we've got to be smart enough to rein in the inequity and have a dynamic market-driven system at the same time.

Do you think the two-party system is disintegrating?
It's in trouble. The country's in way too much trouble to be farting around like we are. The American people deserve better, and if the two-party system isn't disintegrating, it certainly deserves to be shaken up and challenged. ×××

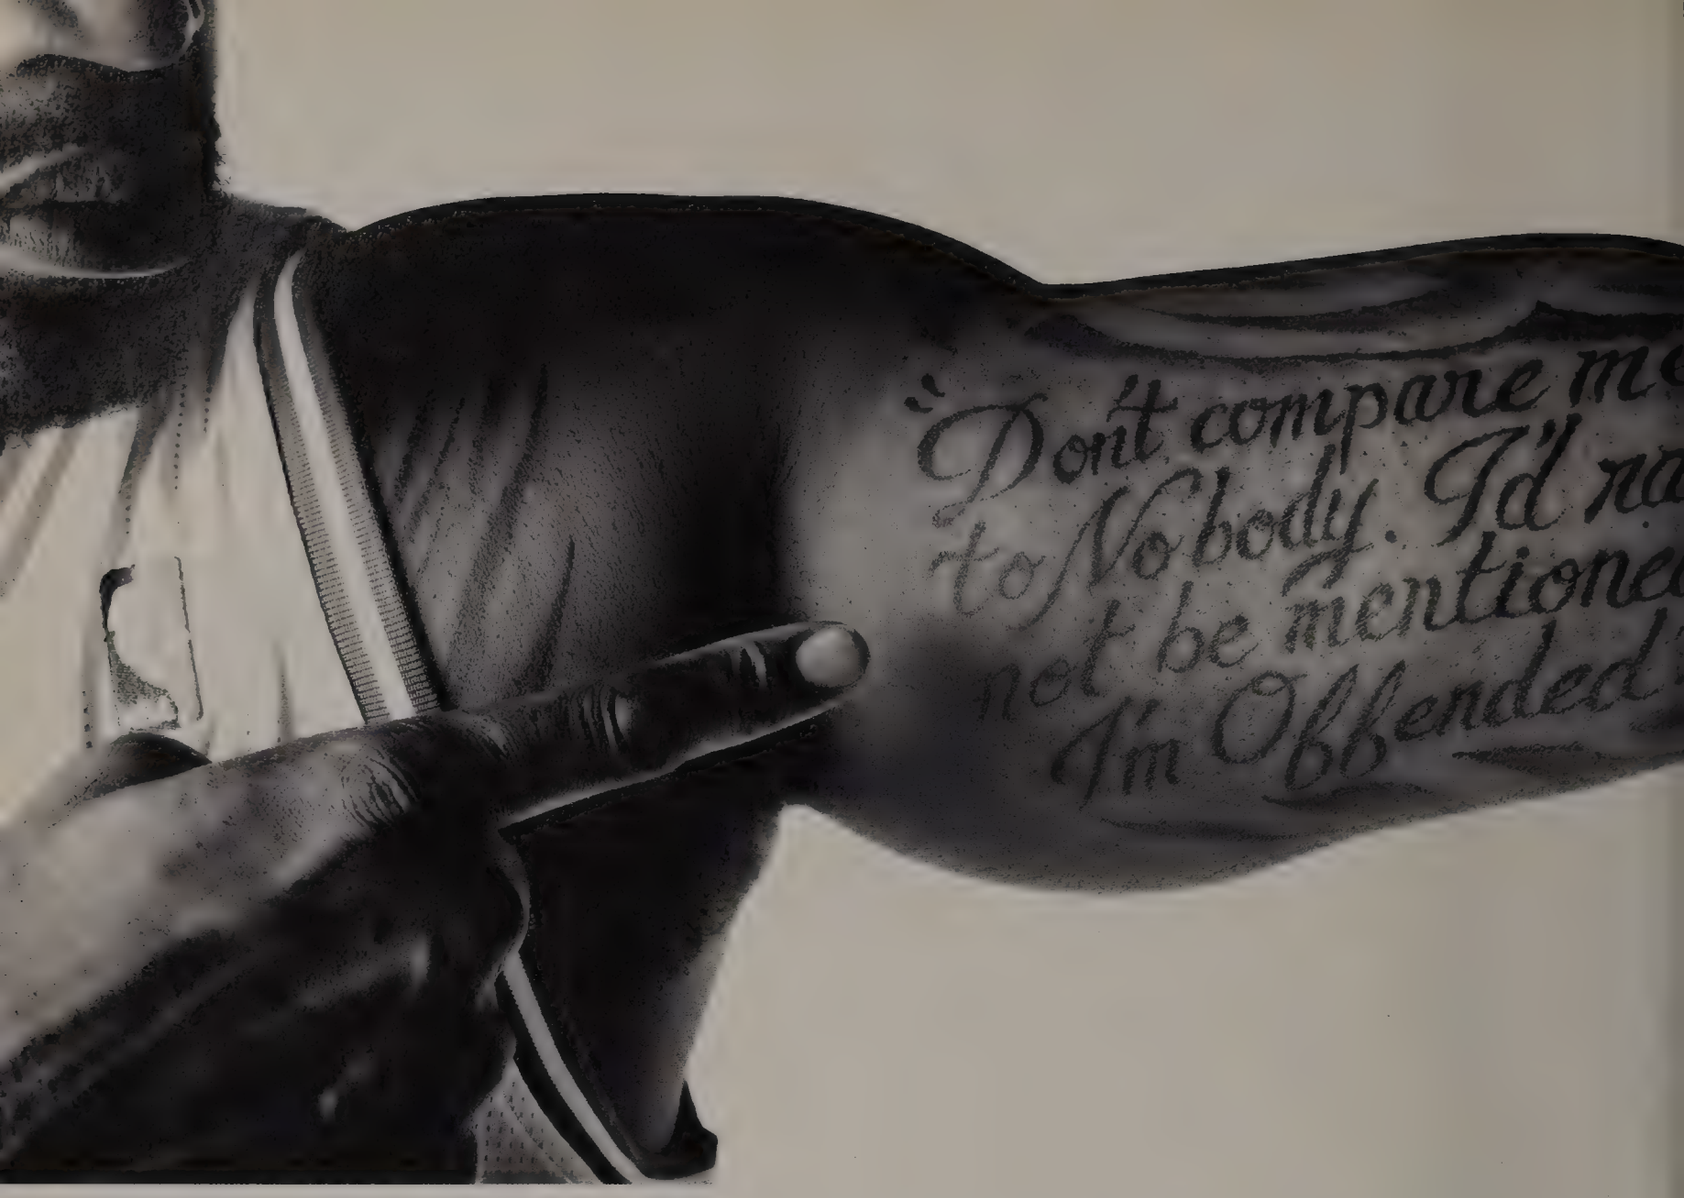
CENTER OF ATTENTION

SHAQ LOOKS BACK ON HIS YEARS IN THE SPOTLIGHT.

BY MICHAEL HOLLEY | PHOTOGRAPHS BY KERRY BRETT



SHAQUILLE O'NEAL, APPROPRIATELY, IS STANDING IN THE PAINT. HE WEARS A DESIGNER TWO-PIECE SUIT, SIZE 23 NAVY DRESS SLIPPERS AND A SMILE THAT COMPETES WITH THE WHITE LIGHTS FLASHING AROUND HIM. A PHOTOGRAPHER HAS STATIONED SHAQ, 38, ON AN AREA OF THE COURT THAT'S BEEN HIS HOME SINCE HE WAS A 20-YEAR-OLD ROOKIE. HE BELONGS HERE, NO MATTER WHAT YOUR DEFINITION OF "HERE" IS.

If here is two photo shoots in one day, one for a magazine based in Boston and the other in France, it's not a problem. He realized years ago that being accessible, winning championships and delivering well-timed quips could ensure international popularity and wealth long after his retirement.

If here is Boston, with Hall of Famers on the court and the history of others in the rafters, that's OK, too. Shaq's NBA time sheet shows more than 41,000 minutes played, or about 690 hours. His body of work will put him in the conversation when the greatest centers of all time are discussed. He believes his style of play, defined by unapologetic force and a nightly takeover of the paint, will make the conversation a short one.

"I'm changing my philosophy on how to think," he says. "The word 'best' has been thrown around too much. Am I the best center of all time? No. Am I the most skilled? No. The best shooting center? No. But how about 'dominant'? Am I the most dominant? I'd have to say, yeah, it's either me or Wilt [Chamberlain]."

Here, in the twilight of a career that's produced well over a dozen All-Star Games, a half dozen teams, five rap albums, four championships, three consecutive NBA Finals MVP trophies, two reality shows and an MBA, Shaq is unintentionally giving a how-to course on living in the public eye and embracing it. Passionately. He became a Celtic in August and is already one of the most engaging personalities in the city. He's hung out in Harvard Square, been part of a sing-along at Cheers, given away food to the needy, volunteered to show up at a family's dinner table to raise money for charity and teased his 3-million-plus Twitter followers by tweeting a phone number and inviting them to call him (it was actually a joke line).

"The one thing about him is that he has retained his childlike screwing-around-ness that he had when he was 20," says writer Jack McCallum. "But he's perfected it, and now it's a lot more sophisticated. He gets it. I think he has a pretty canny idea that he can still be 'Shaq' when he's 60. He can be his generation's Charles Barkley."

McCallum, a former senior writer at Sports Illustrated, knew the 20-year-old Shaq better than most. In 1993, the two were co-authors of a book on the 7'1" center's rookie year with the Orlando Magic. At the time, there were many who bought into Chamberlain's assertion that, "Nobody loves Goliath." No one Chamberlain's or Shaq's size had ever been a serious pitchman for products appealing to sports fans. Shaq debunked that notion by selling shoes, his first album (which went platinum) and, most importantly, his personality.

"AM I THE MOST DOMINANT? I'D HAVE TO SAY, YEAH, IT'S EITHER ME OR WILT."

"He was always totally accessible and friendly," McCallum says. "I remember one night he must've stayed out until two, three in the morning. I was rushing to get the book done, so he knew I needed to talk to him when I was in town. I went to his place, and a friend of his was there and said, 'Shaq is upstairs.' So I remember going upstairs, and he was half asleep under the covers. I swear, I remember putting the tape recorder next to his mouth and interviewing him as he barely talked above a whisper. But we got the book done, and I was impressed by his insistence on reading the manuscript and making sure it sounded like him."

What that meant was the 20-year-old Shaq explaining to the then-44-year-old McCallum the meaning of certain slang that he wanted in the book. Now that Shaq has expanded his interests to real estate, investing in restaurants, starring in TV programs and having a hand in national comedy shows (he has one coming to Boston in March), he insists that everything he's a part of be "authentic."

"All the stuff that I do, the way I am, I've been taught that by my mother and father," he says. "Some people, when I watch them, I can tell that they've been forced to do something rather than doing it from the heart. I can just look at them and tell.

"I told a guy one day, a marketing guy, I told him, 'Image is reality.' You can't create your image. If you try to create it, it don't last. Reality kicks in and you'll be exposed. With me, what you see is what you get. I don't have a high vocabulary. I have tattoos. I'm a guy that can play on both sides. I can play on the silly side, and I can play on the intelligent side. I think people relate to me because they can see that I'm a real person."

The real person, and sometimes very silly person, is on display in the paint. As the camera clicks, one-liners and possibly exaggerations roll.

Shaq is asked who made his expensive-looking suit. "The same dude who makes Obama's suits," he says without missing a beat.

Shaq is asked to roll up his sleeves and show his tats while he's in his suit. He refuses. "You think Steve Jobs is taking a picture like that? I'm a businessman."

Shaq refuses to put on a green top hat, presumably because he knows it will make him look like an oversized leprechaun. He graciously signs hats, magazines and pictures. He reads people. He sees a short young woman and says, "Are you Jewish?" She laughs and replies, "Is it that obvious?"

"There are certain guys who are funny in a sports context, and there are some guys who are just funny, whether it's sports or a cocktail party," McCallum says. "Shaq is funny." That may be one of the reasons he's one of the people responsible for what is now an annual showcase: All-Star Comedy Jam. Dozens of comedians, from up-and-comers to established names such as Cedric the Entertainer, Mo'Nique and Paul Mooney have been part of Shaq's shows.

"YOU CAN'T CREATE YOUR IMAGE. IF YOU TRY TO CREATE IT, IT DON'T LAST."

WHDH-TV Channel 7 sports anchor/reporter Larry Ridley has known Shaq since 2005, when Shaq was a member of the Heat. As a reporter, Ridley has had many opportunities to see the big man being interviewed. But what impresses him is the way Shaq handles himself at the comedy shows. Comedian Aries Spears has a hilarious routine in which he imitates Shaq's mumble and adds that "there should be a bouncing ball with words so we know what you're trying to say."

"I've been at shows where I'm one table away from him, and he's a good sport about it," Ridley says. "I was watching him to see how he'd respond, and he was laughing as hard as everyone else."

Shaq says his good humor is no big deal.

"Hey man, if you can laugh at yourself, you can laugh at anything. I know I mumble. Sometimes I do it on purpose. But when I hear Aries' impression, I think it's funny, so I laugh."

It's been good times for Shaq in Boston. All he knew about the city before was his room at the Four Seasons, Legal Sea Foods and a club or two. Now he appears to be on a campaign to make himself an honorary Bostonian. He's also trying to do something that is surprisingly rare, given the combined 33 championships between the Celtics and Lakers: Become a champion with both teams. Bill Sharman won with the Celtics and Lakers, but he coached the latter. Rick Fox played for both teams but only won with the Lakers. A title for Shaq would make him a champion as a Laker and Celtic, and it'd give him five rings, matching the total of on-again, off-again rival Kobe Bryant.

"What I like about Boston is that we're all on the same page," Shaq says. "Everyone knows it's about winning championships."

McCallum is at work on a new book, featuring the 1992 Dream Team, and he recently interviewed seven-footer Patrick Ewing. During the conversation, Ewing admitted that he's sorry he wasn't more open with the media. "But it would've been strange to see him more like Shaq," McCallum says. "I guess you could speculate that Shaq could've been something crazy like a 40 [points] and 23 [rebounds] guy if he had been more serious than he was, but that wasn't him."

Instead, what you see is a man happily playing and talking, as if he never wants to look back with a single regret. ✖✖✖

A FIGHTING CHANCE

CAN A KARATE NOVICE LEARN ANYTHING USEFUL IN A SINGLE DAY?

ONE MAN ENTERS THE DRAGON TO FIND OUT.

BY EZRA DYER / PHOTOGRAPHS BY ADAM DETOUR

KARATE IS A LIFELONG DISCIPLINE. EVEN FOR THE MOST SKILLED PRACTITIONER OF THE ART, THERE'S NO FINISH LINE, NO DESIGNATED POINT WHERE YOU EARN A HANDSHAKE AND CONGRATULATIONS ON LEARNING ALL THERE IS TO KNOW. KARATE REQUIRES DEDICATION, COMMITMENT, THE WILLINGNESS TO SUFFER A LITANY OF SMALL FRUSTRATIONS IN PURSUIT OF LONG-TERM GOALS THAT MAY NEVER BE ATTAINABLE. JUST AS ROME WASN'T BUILT IN A DAY, YOU CAN'T LEARN KARATE IN ONE LESSON. HOWEVER, SINCE I'M INHERENTLY LAZY AND IMPATIENT, I DECIDED TO TRY TO DO EXACTLY THAT.

Could I learn any useful fighting skills in one day? The Boston Center for Adult Education's Boston Martial Arts Academy is the place to find out. I'm paired with sensei Jason Gould from Emerald Necklace Martial Arts to assess whether I have what it takes to become an instant asskicker. Gould doesn't promise he can make me into a ninja in one session, but on the other hand... he doesn't say he can't.

Upon my arrival at the BCAE, I'm provided with a little welcome package: a gi (the loose-fitting pants and jacket that us newbies might refer to as "karate clothes"), and, to my great surprise, a cup. And not the kind you put coffee in. This is a perplexing item, because I kind of assumed that I'd just learn some cool moves like the Lunging Monkey Fist or the Toe of Death and call it a day. If anything, I'd be on the delivery side of the punching/kicking equation. I assumed my gonads weren't at risk of blunt-force trauma.

You know what you say about assumptions: When you assume, you get kicked in the throat by a black belt. But I'm getting ahead of myself.

Cup in place, a bright white belt advertising my kitten-like vulnerability, I meet Gould in a classroom upstairs. He eyes my belt, knotted with guesswork and reckless abandon, and says, "First, let's learn how to tie your belt." There's a procedure—finding the middle of the belt, doing some fancy rabbit-through-the-hole maneuvers, knotting it off so the ends splay to the sides—that produces the desired result. You don't just tie it like shoelaces. So I know that now. What next?

"The plan today is to show you as much as I can over the next three hours," Gould says. "Then we're going to go downstairs and spar, to see what you've learned." The format is tournament-style: Each fighter scores a point for breaching the other's defenses; the first one to notch three points wins the round. Eyeing a bag of protective gear sitting in the corner (padded gloves, shinguards, mouthpieces), I ask Gould how intense this sparring session will get. "You're gonna get hit," he says cheerfully.

What? I thought this was like fencing, where you just touch the person to score a point. I'm about to be disabused of this notion. Or, more accurately, abused.

Gi looking proper, we move to the next step: the bow. The bow is important. It's a gesture of respect for your opponent. So Gould probably shouldn't bow to me, but it's nice that he does anyway.

"Now, let's set your stance," Gould says. I face him with my left foot forward and pointed in his direction and my right foot behind and at a slight angle. My left arm bends up in front of me to protect my body and my right arm slides back, with my fist up near my chin to protect my head. The idea is to stay balanced while presenting the smallest possible target to your opponent. In this very basic stance, your left arm is for blocking and your right is for striking. Ideally, you should be able to instantly reverse them, depending on your assailant's moves, but for now we're keeping it simple.

Gould holds up a pad and tells me to throw a punch. I do. It's pathetic. "Rotate your body and extend your arm all the way through," he says. I'm making a rookie mistake, thinking about bringing my arm back before my fist even meets the pad—literally pulling my punches. Is there a martial arts discipline for slap-fighting? Gould encourages me to hit harder, exhaling and shouting a kiai (in layman's terms, the karate yell) as my fist meets the pad. Soon, I'm generating a satisfying impact. This punching thing is going really well for me. I might have to start my own dojo.

But then we add kicks. I'm not so good at this part. Gould tries to show me a simple combination, a punch followed by a front kick, but it always feels spazzy. The blame lies in my hillbilly feet. You can throw a strong kick all day long, but if your foot's in the wrong position, you'll end up breaking your toes in the process of scoring a point. The main idea is to keep your toes out of the way and use the ball of your foot, or the side, as your striking surface. But my toes insist on being part of the program, so I instinctively dial back the power of my kicks.

Of course, my legs could come in handy for something else: running away.

FIGHT CLUBS

The next BCAE martial arts course, "More Than Fighting: An Introduction to the Martial Arts," will be held on Jan. 23. Go to bcae.org or call 617-267-4430. For sensei Jason Gould's Allston studio, Emerald Necklace Martial Arts, visit karateinboston.com or call 617-202-3856

"If I want to hit you, I've got to reach you first," Gould says. "There are a couple ways I can do that. I can advance by moving my front foot first. That's fast, but you can see what I'm doing. Or, you can move your back foot first—not as quick, but sneakier." Gould demonstrates the back-foot-first approach. "One second I'm here," he says, as he stands in his fighting stance about five feet away. "And the next, I'm here." All of a sudden, Gould glides right up in my face, without seeming to have moved his legs. "And now I can hit you," he points out.

I try the back-foot-first technique, but a lifetime of muscle memory is telling me that this is the wrong way to perambulate around a room. I have to concentrate very deliberately to make my feet move into punching position. I am, in a word, slow. Comparatively, when Gould demonstrates these moves, he does so at black-belt speed. And often with a kiai, which scares the crap out of me every time. It's hard to look like I'm karate material when I keep flinching in cowardice.

The three-hour lesson goes by fast. Gould shows me how to block with one arm and then counterpunch with the other. He teaches me to throw different kicks. I now have a few moves in my arsenal, at least. I ask what sort of advanced tricks I'd learn if I stuck with my training. Let me say this: You quickly realize the frailty of the human body once someone starts pointing out all the ways you can break it.

Knees are a pretty gruesome target to attack. So are fingers and wrists. (The essential idea is that joints don't like to go in directions they weren't designed to move.) To a black belt, your head looks like a big collection of targets. And then there's that quaint human requirement for an uninterrupted blood supply to the brain. "You can do an air choke or a blood choke," Gould says, and those things are exactly what they sound like. "You want me to show you what that feels like?" Gould asks. No, I believe you!

With my head full of the ways I could be instantly maimed, we venture downstairs to the main studio. It's time to fight.

Three judges from the BCAE Martial Arts Academy watch our mini-tournament to assess points. Gould suggests that we refrain from punching one another in the head, and I have no problem agreeing.

"We're going to do this in three rounds," Gould says. "First, I'll let you come at me. Then I'll start engaging you. And then I'm gonna come at you."

Gould and I bow, and it's on. Or it would be, if I could remember anything I'm supposed to do. All the combinations, all the footwork, is sequestered in some inaccessible node of my brain now that I need it. I throw a right jab. And another. And another. On the blank white error screen of my mind, this is the only move I can remember. I try a few half-hearted kicks, but they're more like tentative feints. As Gould and I circle each other, sweat beads on my forehead—somehow, I'm getting winded without actually doing anything. Being bad at karate is hard work.

The judges score the first round for Gould. Big surprise—they're obviously biased just because he's bigger and faster and has years of experience. I think I got him a couple times with my killer right jab. But we're on to round two, in which Gould promised to attack me more. I soon discover that I'm a natural at blocking and retreating. There are a couple of times when Gould intentionally leaves himself open for a counterpunch, but I don't perceive the opportunity. I'm so happy that I didn't getting whacked, I don't think about my attacks. Absent counterpunching, my blocking arm is getting quite a workout, and the next day the side of my forearm will be a festive collage of colorful bruises. Round two goes to the sensei.

I could probably do without a third round at this point, but I'm not a quitter. What I am is someone who's about to discover what it's like to get into a fight with a black belt.

It turns out that no matter how good you are, martial arts comes down to two people fighting. So if one of them does something that the other doesn't expect—like, say, a less-than-white-belt steps forward when he logically should be retreating—that's how people get kicked in the throat. I don't mean that as a hypothetical.

Gould chases me around the BCAE's first-floor studio, throwing a blizzard of kicks and punches that are calibrated to connect without actually killing me. But, contrary to popular perception, ninjas don't have eyes in the back of their heads, so when Gould throws a spinning kick, he's momentarily blind to my erratic dodging. I step forward, directly into his rapidly approaching foot, which has somehow materialized right up at throat level. His foot connects with my larynx—not hard, but than again, any kick to the larynx feels pretty substantial. An odd brand of numbness grips my windpipe, but I shake it off and act like I barely noticed. Is that all you've got, sensei? I've got a trachea like a potbelly stove, my friend. Cast iron. I spend the remainder of the round futilely trying to throw counterpunches while pretending that my neck feels normal.

Per the Vegas odds on this fight (1,000,000:1), I'm defeated a third time. But I feel like I now know enough that I'd have an advantage over someone with zero training. If I ever again find myself engaged in fisticuffs with someone who, like Gould, describes himself as a "martial arts geek," I know a great move: spin around 180 degrees, then put one foot in front of the other in rapid succession until you're in Mexico.

That answers our original question. You can indeed learn something useful in just one lesson. But if you decide to forego the sensible strategy, my advice is to watch your throat. And wear a cup. ✖✖✖

YULE LOVE IT

TO MARK ITS 40TH anniversary, The Christmas Revels returns to medieval England this year, celebrating the winter solstice in the merry olde style that made it as much of a holiday institution as overspiked eggnog. The singers, dancers and musicians are a medley of pros and willing amateurs, the costumes are feudal and the performances count among The Revels' greatest hits: the Abbots Bromley Horn Dance, the St. George and the Dragon mummers' play and, of course, the participatory Lord of the Dance.

HAYLEY MILLER

The Christmas Revels runs Dec. 17–29, 1, 3, 5:30 and 7:30 pm, $25–$52, adults; $15–$42, children under 12 at Sanders Theatre, 45 Quincy St., Cambridge (617-496-2222) revels.org

Toast of the Town

Shaq of all Trades

It's not often that Shaquille O'Neal dropping the ball is a cause for celebration. (Not that he'd ever do such a thing.) On Dec. 31, O'Neal hits Strega Waterfront to cohost "Party on the Harbor," which tips off 2011 with performances by Maxine Nightingale, the Deney Terrio Dance Party and music from DJ JJ Wright. High atop Fan Pier, you'll enjoy Italian food, spectacular views of the city skyline and the Boston Harbor fireworks at midnight. And you can swim in bubbly at the endless Champagne bar. Shaq's New Year's resolution? Abandon any plans for Kazaam 2.

Christmas Passed

Rock Around the Clock After a month of caroling, eggnog and forced merriment, a lot of people find it hard to muster up much energy for New Year's. By 11:30, even the most festive spirits can feel like the ball has dropped on their heads, rather than in Times Square. Speakeasy Stage Company's new rock musical, Striking 12, mixes Scrooge with Hans Christian Andersen's Little Match Girl to tell the story of a miserable man whose plans to rebel against the holiday are magically upended. The countdown runs through Jan. 2 at the BCA. Johanna Kaiser

Black Swan ★★★★ Flirting with ridiculousness on its way to the sublime, Black Swan is either the greatest stupid movie I've seen all year, or the stupidest great movie. Such petty distinctions hardly matter when you're caught up in its headlong rush. Natalie Portman stars as a stunted porcelain ballerina living in a cramped apartment with her stage mommy (Barbara Hershey), until she gets the role of a lifetime playing both the virginal white swan and her slatternly black counterpart in her company's latest production. Down the rabbit hole we go, getting a first-person view of her escalating mania, thanks to director Darren Aronofsky's dizzying technique. Keeping the camera claustrophobically close to his heroine, he cuts and jumps while cranking up the Grand-Guignol music cues. Walls of mirrors hammer home the doppelgänger themes. Shot on 16mm by the brilliant Matthew Libatique, the film's palette retreats into high-contrast blacks, whites and blood-reds as we descend into chaos. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square, Coolidge Corner and West Newton Cinema.)

Conviction ★★ A small-screen picture with a big-screen cast, Conviction tells the true story of Betty Anne Waters, a gutsy Northern Massachusetts waitress whose wayward brother, Kenny, was wrongfully accused of murder. As played by Sam Rockwell, Ken's a bit of a wild man, but he sure as heck ain't no killer. Plucky Betty Anne seeks to prove her big brother's innocence—gosh darn it—even if she has to go to law school herself to get the job done! Hilary Swank headlines as Betty Anne, bringing that specifically Swank-ian strain of toothy gumption that sometimes makes you wish Clint Eastwood would drop by and euthanize her again. The blandly inspirational Conviction goes down painlessly, with a minimum of you-go-girl montages and even less suspense. We never have any doubt as to the outcome or any question of Kenny's innocence. There's just not a lot of conflict in Pamela Gray's screenplay, which strikes me as odd considering that it's about a gross miscarriage of justice that cost a man 18 years of his life. (In the suburbs.)

Due Date ★★ Director Todd Phillips and star Zach Galifianakis brought an unexpected edge of aggression to 2009's sleeper smash The Hangover, which made sense as it was a tale of loutish dudes on a lost weekend. Alas, their follow-up is a rather shameless rip-off of John Hughes' Planes, Trains and Automobiles starring Robert Downey Jr. as a Type-A yuppie stuck traveling cross-country with Galifianakis' emotionally stunted, grieving loser. Hughes' 1987 holiday perennial might be slightly overrated, but the innate sweetness of Steve Martin and John Candy compensated for the frustrating travel contrivances. In a bold but ultimately misguided move, Phillips ramps up the unpleasantness, complete with gunshot wounds, rampant profanity, one too many car chases and even a masturbating dog. Downey might be the only actor charming enough to get away with punching a child, but the entire enterprise suffers from desperate envelope-pushing. It's ugly for its own sake, with Galifianakis' inscrutable performance suggesting that he's already on his way to becoming the next Jack Black. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

For Colored Girls ★★ Every nine months or so, Tyler Perry cranks out another soap opera in which he wears a dress. But now he's tackled material that most folks said couldn't be translated, and it turns out they were right. Yet the movie remains strangely watchable, even when it's bonkers. Especially when it's bonkers. Perry lacks tonal control, the ability to modulate performances and even rudimentary visual skills, but the dude has massive cojones. Ntozake Shange's beloved 1975 play comprised seven women reading a series of 20 poems, telling intertwined tales of abuse, abandonment, abortion and rape. It's an awful lot to juggle, especially since Perry hasn't found a way to organically incorporate Shange's poems into the screenplay. The words are beautiful, the execution garish. For Colored Girls actually works once in a while, when a few of the actresses (most notably Tessa Thompson and Phylicia Rashad) are allowed to hold the screen alone and tear into the language. But such moments throw the awful filmmaking into even sharper relief. (In the suburbs.)

Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows: Part I ★★ Half a movie at full-ticket price, the seventh film of this beloved series follows in the footsteps of last summer's woefully underwhelming Half-Blood Prince, serving as a glum exposition dump with no payoff. Adored by the rabid fans of JK Rowling's books and confounding to us Muggles, the Potter films are increasingly alienating to anyone not up-to-date on Quidditch strategy. Presupposing a familiarity with the source material, the latest installment begins mid-

Wahlberg and Adams ward off this film's lesser elements.

The Fighter ★★★
Starring Mark Wahlberg, Christian Bale, Amy Adams, Melissa Leo, Mickey O'Keefe and Jack McGee. Screenplay by Scott Silver, Paul Tamasy and Eric Johnson. Directed by David O. Russell. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

STARVED DOWN TO A SKELETAL shadow of himself, Christian Bale first appears bellowing into the camera. Bug-eyed, with green rotted teeth and an omnipresent tattered baseball cap, his Dicky Eklund is a jabbering glad-hander, the self-proclaimed "Pride of Lowell." Bale's shocking look and garish accent are startling, his energy unrelenting.

This is the kind of terrible performance that wins Academy Awards. Thirty minutes into the picture I wanted somebody in a tux to walk out and hand him the Oscar already, so he'd go away.

A low-budget labor of love for producer/star Mark Wahlberg, The Fighter follows The Town and Conviction in this year's Massachusetts Lampoon Show, in which glamorous movie stars drop their R's and wear tacky clothes to convey "authenticity." Blue-collar Bostonian has replaced redneck as Hollywood's white-trash signifier of choice.

Thankfully nowhere near as silly as Ben Affleck's recent attempt to turn Charlestown into the Wild West with tracksuits instead of chaps, The Fighter turns out to be a pretty good movie. Especially when Bale is offscreen.

Based on the true story of local boxing legend "Irish" Micky Ward, the film stars Wahlberg as the long-suffering anchor of a spectacularly dysfunctional family. As a pal said, it's "the white Precious."

Mother Alice Ward (Melissa Leo) is a caterwauling piece of work, the kind of shrew who smokes extra-long cigarettes and always claims that this is only her third Scotch. She's been managing Micky's career with little success, mismatching the poor kid with opponents 20 pounds heavier, blithely ignoring his growing reputation as a punching bag for up-and-comers. Half-brother Dicky might be a brilliant corner-man and one-time contender, but he's also a raging crackhead. Seven ghastly, interchangeable sisters swarm around the living room screaming obscenities, and his sad-sack dad (the great Jack McGee) spends most squabbles attempting to slip away undetected.

Micky's in his 30s, which is an awfully late stage in any boxer's career, and he's staring down a life of being a never-was in the shadow of his has-been brother. Still punchy from another pounding in the ring, Micky falls for Charlene (Amy Adams). A tough, potty-mouthed bartender who blew her shot at a scholarship by partying too hard, she's trying to turn things around and imagine a life beyond Lowell's clannish watering holes and dead-end streets. Can she inspire Micky to do the same?

The screenplay by Scott Silver, Paul Tamasy and Eric Johnson leaves no cliché unturned. The Fighter still works, partially because of the energetic filmmaking by director David O. Russell, but mostly thanks to subtle, heartfelt performances by Wahlberg and Adams.

A magnificent comic actor who excels at supporting parts, Wahlberg has never before quite cut it as a leading man. He's got a meathead charm that's too often sapped by stalwart hero roles. At his worst, Wahlberg becomes recessive, sulking his way through misguided projects like The Happening or The Lovely Bones, when we really want to see the kind of livewire energy that allowed him to run away with The Departed. So credit Russell, who previously collaborated with Wahlberg on two of his best performances (1999's Three Kings and 2004's I Heart Huckabees) for fostering this onscreen coming-of-age. The Artist Formerly Known as Marky Mark is simply wonderful here, holding the film's center with quiet dignity, channeling his comedic chops for a couple of priceless reaction shots and allowing the audience to come to him, especially when his fellow actors are bleating for our attention.

Adams is no slouch, either. A million miles from her sunny princess in Enchanted, her Charlene is a good deal paunchier and more uncompromising than most movie girlfriends. Spouting invectives in ill-fitting belly-shirts, she's got a Kewpie-doll face and a backbone of steel. Perhaps by design, Wahlberg and Adams mimic Ward's strategy inside the ring, allowing scene partners to punch themselves out before moving in for swift, economical body blows.

Betrayals and reconciliations are inevitable, and The Fighter never strays too far from the traditional sports-movie formula. But Russell shoots the film from unexpected angles. The local color feels naturalistic instead of fetishized. Russell's 1996 screwball classic Flirting With Disaster established that nobody's better at orchestrating a room full of shouting characters, but The Fighter excels in quieter passages.

A wordless predawn sequence finds Micky once again donning his sweats and heading back into training. It's the kind of triumphant turning point that most filmmakers would've oversold. But Russell allows it to play out in silent wide-shots, keeping Wahlberg in the far corners of the frames, dwarfed by his surroundings, à la Stallone in the original Rocky. It's a gorgeous moment that brought tears to my eyes, and the kind of grace note that compensates for a lot of this picture's many missteps. ✖✖✖ speech and ends with a cliffhanger. Constant references are made to the events of previous pictures, which some of us haven't seen in years and frankly can't remember all that well. A shame, as director David Yates' first crack at the franchise (2007's Order of the Phoenix) was the only Potter film to function as a stand-alone movie. No such luck this time, and some lovely visuals can't compensate for a brutal second half in which all the kids mope around the woods like it's wizard Twilight. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Hereafter ★★ ½ Solemn, heartfelt and a little goofy, Clint Eastwood's 32nd directorial effort will never be confused with his masterpieces. It's his most uneven work behind the camera in years, unusually shaped and, at times, tonally confounding. Despite these flaws, Hereafter also contains moments of beauty and startling power, making the sloppiness forgivable. Anchored by yet another excellent performance by Matt Damon, playing a troubled psychic hiding from the world, Peter Morgan's screenplay follows three separate storylines centered on loss and the afterlife, which inevitably converge in underwhelming fashion. Growing less interested in the title subject as the film progresses, Hereafter eventually seems more concerned with loneliness in this life than anything that happens after death. But as these characters start shaking off their grief, colors bleed back into the images and the shadowy chiaroscuros of Tom Stern's cinematography begin to lift. (In the suburbs.)

I Love You Phillip Morris ★ ½ Shelved since its Sundance premiere almost two years ago, the self-satisfied directorial debut of Bad Santa screenwriters Glenn Ficarra and John Requa stars Jim Carrey in the true story of conman Steven Jay Russell. A habitual jail-breaker, Russell routinely defrauded and eluded creditors and captors in a rather ingenious white-collar crime spree. He was also a homosexual, which the filmmakers have decided is not just the only interesting thing about his story, but also the end-all-be-all of modern comedy. Carrey, a needy performer at his most manic and pleading, vamps it up with Ewan McGregor's absurdly naïve Southern belle, and both graphically swap spit (among other things) in one confrontational close-up after another. Downplaying the tale's more intriguing elements in favor of vulgarity and shock value, Ficarra and Requa apparently suffer under the delusion that there's nothing more scandalous than the sight of boys kissing. Get over it, guys. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Inside Job ★★★ ½ Charles Ferguson—who helmed the extraordinary Iraq documentary No End in Sight—turns his attention to the 2008 economic meltdown. The results are harrowing, infuriating and laced with a surprising strain of gallows humor. Narrated by Matt Damon, Inside Job provides an invaluable guide to credit default swaps and collateralized debt obligations, making Wall Street jargon accessible to even a numerically challenged lunkhead like yours truly. It's hard not to get your ire up watching these exorbitantly compensated robber barons fleecing pension funds with falsely rated junk investments. Ferguson has a gift for clarity, explaining derivatives in ways that flummoxed Michael Moore in last year's dismal Capitalism: A Love Story. Cathartic but less successful is a sequence in which the filmmaker questions a few econ wizards. It's fun to watch them squirm but feels cheap in comparison to the rest of the picture's razor-sharp outrage and simplicity. Everybody who's in some money trouble should see this film. So I guess that means just about everybody should see this film. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

The King's Speech ★★ ½ Rocky for stutterers, director Tom Hooper's film is a perfectly acceptable middlebrow diversion, the kind of British delight that hoovers up Oscars without leaving much of a lasting impression (see also: Shakespeare in Love). Colin Firth stars as stammering King George VI, who must warily assume the throne after some extramarital shenanigans by his brother throw the monarchy into crisis. Timid and tongue-tied, Firth seeks the counsel of Geoffrey Rush's oddball speech therapist, as this newfangled invention called the radio requires our leaders to be articulate. Slyly grafting an amusing anecdote onto a large historical canvas, The King's Speech feigns an importance it doesn't earn. The movie does, however, contain some nicely calibrated performances and droll asides. Too bad Hooper shoots it all with distracting fish-eye lenses and oversells the comedy before shoveling on the pathos. Still, it's harmless enough, for this kind of thing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Love and Other Drugs ★★ ½ By turns a raunchy bedroom farce, a health-care industry satire, a chick flick and a '90s nostalgia piece, watching Love and Other Drugs sometimes feels like channel surfing. Jake Gyllenhaal's callow, studly drug rep meets his match in Anne Hathaway's brassy Bohemian artist, who shares his hobby of casual fornication. Despite the best efforts of both parties, they soon find themselves in (gasp!) a relationship. Things get tricky, as she suffers from early onset Parkinson's. Thanks to Hathaway's marvelous performance, we see a young woman always on her guard, determined to shield herself from any attachments, as they'll inevitably end in heartbreak. It's a gutsy turn with some surprisingly sharp edges. But the sharper Hathaway gets, the gummier the movie becomes. Gyllenhaal is Hollywood's luckiest actor, and not just because his job entails rolling around with a naked Anne Hathaway. Has such a modestly talented actor ever been so consistently outmatched onscreen? (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Morning Glory ★★★ A cut above the regular rom-com—but a couple notches below the caliber of the talent involved—Roger Michell's daytime TV farce is sprightly, perfectly diverting entertainment. (Though screenwriter Aline Brosh McKenna hews so close to her script for The Devil Wears Prada, you might assume she simply used the find/replace function on her computer.) The innately appealing Rachel McAdams stars as a workaholic producer trying to salvage a moribund morning show hosted by Diane Keaton's dyspeptic Meredith Vieira clone. Her solution is to drag in Harrison Ford's stuck-up Dan Rather wannabe, and the ensuing backstage shenanigans play like Prada's workplace nightmares multiplied. Ford, delivering his first bona fide performance in decades, is hilarious. Too much time is wasted on a go-nowhere romantic subplot between McAdams and stiff Patrick Wilson, but it's an elegantly crafted picture all the same. Michell makes expert use of the widescreen frame and brings the best out of his veteran cast. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

127 Hours ★★ In 2003, Aron Ralston was on a solo climbing expedition in Utah's Blue John Canyon when he fell and got his right arm pinned by a boulder. With no food, precious little water, and not a soul for miles, Ralston was trapped for five days, eventually freeing himself by cutting off his arm with the dull blade of a cheap multipurpose tool. It's a grim survival tale—and another reminder of why I seldom go outdoors. But Slumdog Millionaire director Danny Boyle tackles the story with his usual frenzy, zipping the camera around and throwing so much junk at the screen, I thought I saw a kitchen sink in there somewhere. It's all so busy, so self-consciously virtuosic, that the movie never engages with its own premise. Despite a fine one-man-show by James Franco, we never face the horror of Ralston's isolation, as the five days go by awfully fast. There's no catharsis when he's freed because the movie never bothered to sit still. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square, Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

Rabbit Hole ★★★★ Grief is so much messier and confusing than most movies allow. The miracle of this small, revealing and surprisingly funny gem from director John Cameron Mitchell is that the story begins long after most pictures would've rolled the credits. It's been nine months since a suburban couple (strikingly well-played by Nicole Kidman and Aaron Eckhart) lost their four-year-old son in a car accident. Based on an off-Broadway play by David Lindsay-Abaire, Rabbit Hole is primarily concerned with questions about moving on, how soon is too soon, and can things ever go back to any semblance of normal? As evidenced in his Hedwig and the Angry Inch and triumphant Shortbus, Mitchell is a filmmaker who genuinely likes people, a much scarcer trait than you might imagine. Deeply compassionate and attuned to the odd, amusing moments that sometimes erupt during emotional anguish, Rabbit Hole feels awkward

Red ★★ ½ A terrific concept that barely survives a botched execution, this adaptation of the DC comic stars Bruce Willis as a former CIA agent having a terrible time adjusting to life in the suburbs. When his old team is marked for elimination by the new regime, he's got to hit the retirement homes, round up his old partners and stay one step ahead of these damn, know-it-all kids. It's an irresistible premise, particularly for fans of the "Get Off My Lawn" genre best epitomized by The Expendables or anything starring Clint Eastwood. Red fills out the ranks with a killer cast, perhaps the most overqualified we've seen in a movie mainly concerned with blowing stuff up. Morgan Freeman is all sly smiles and John Malkovich brings the crazy as a paranoid casualty of the CIA's LSD experiments. Too bad a boilerplate, conspiracy-theory plot shuffles everybody from one exploding set-piece to the next. You can't go wrong with Dame Helen Mirren firing a machine gun, but Red comes awfully close. (In the suburbs.)

The Social Network ★★★★ You might be put off by the prospect of a movie about Facebook, but remember that Citizen Kane wasn't really about the newspaper industry. Like that classic, The Social Network uses a media magnate as an entry point to a story more concerned with loneliness and megalomania. It plays like gangbusters. The unlikely pairing of heart-on-his-sleeve, West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin and clinically dyspeptic, Fight Club director David Fincher is unexpectedly revelatory. Zipping back and forth in time from dorms to deposition rooms, the movie isn't so concerned with legal questions of authorship as it is with class differences and the concept of a level playing field in our tech-savvy era. The last shot is a doozy, though. Sorkin and Fincher might as well be saying: "I'm sorry, Mr. Kane, but Rosebud has still not accepted your friend request." (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Somewhere ★★ Nobody does ennui like Sofia Coppola. Amid her plush, often absurdly luxurious hotel-scapes lurks a deep-seated unease. All the soft-focus photography and designer fashions can't disguise the gnawing loneliness that haunts her characters as they sleepwalk through empty lives. Sadly, after only four films this is starting to feel a little routine. Wandering around for a few days with a hollowed-out action-movie hero (Stephen Dorff) as he chases skirts, glad-hands reporters and barely connects with his estranged daughter (Elle Fanning), Somewhere feels like a regurgitation of Coppola's greatest hits. There's a wonderful sense of isolation and little else. Dorff falls asleep at strip shows, avoids his exes and can't quite muster up any understanding of his child's needs. Falling back on that gorgeous atmosphere, Coppola's movie ends up as stunted as its protagonist. This is the first 10 minutes of Lost in Translation stretched out for two hours, and Stephen Dorff is no Bill Murray. (At Kendall Square.)

Tiny Furniture ★★★ ½ Misconstrued in snobbish circles as a rich girl mope-fest, the annoyingly accomplished 24-year-old writer/director Lena Dunham's second feature demonstrates a considerable skill set as well as a flair for self-deprecating comedy. Playing a barely disguised version of herself (family members and friends costar as themselves, and the movie was shot in her mother's SoHo apartment), Dunham arrives home after finishing Oberlin and stares into an abyss of postgraduate inertia. Selfish, directionless and socially awkward in her best moments, she flounders around the lower Manhattan art scene, clinging on to all the wrong friends while drifting from one corrosive love interest to another. Cinematographer Jody Lee Lipes makes extraordinary use of the blank-white Kubrickian interiors, as Dunham allows some very funny sequences to play out in a deadpan, deliberately muted tone. Apropos of its unfocused protagonist, the movie wanders from uncomfortable moments to unresolved conflicts, avoiding catharsis in favor of some painfully honest and self-lacerating scenes. In other words, it's Greenberg for girls. (At Kendall Square.)

The Town ★★ The kind of movie about Charlestown that only somebody from Cambridge could make, writer/director Ben Affleck's latest symptom of townie street-cred envy is chockablock with dropped R's, Celtic tattoos and preposterous gangster movie clichés. Casting himself as the kindest, most-sensitive bank robber a gal could ever want, Affleck models a stunning number of local sports insignias and offers close-ups of his sculpted physique doing pull-ups. Adapted from Chuck Hogan's novel Prince of Thieves, The Town lurches from one dead-end plot thread to the next, piling increasingly absurd action sequences atop mawkish arias of self-pity. Mad Men's Jon Hamm trails two steps behind the gang as a distractingly scruffy FBI agent. Only The Hurt Locker's Jeremy Renner, channeling Jimmy Cagney by way of the projects, makes an impression, but even he gets short shrift in Affleck's maudlin climax that's half–Shawshank Redemption, half-naked narcissism. The final shot is the most unintentionally hilarious thing I've seen in ages. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Unstoppable ★★★ Director Tony Scott's fifth collaboration with Denzel Washington is a slick, efficient machine without a single thought in its head besides keeping you entertained for 98 minutes. Based on actual events presumably exaggerated out of all conceivable proportion, the film follows a runaway freight train roaring through rural Pennsylvania. To sweeten the deal, this particular choo-choo happens to be laden with hazardous chemicals, prompting Rosario Dawson's railroad manager to describe it as "a missile the size of the Chrysler building!" Lucky for us, a couple hundred miles down the line we've got a grizzled conductor (Denzel Washington) and his rookie partner (Chris Pine) on what was supposed to be a routine assignment. What makes this film such fun is that there's no villain, just a one-thing-after-another series of logistical problems. Unstoppable's clean narrative lines lock Scott into a scenario where his usual restless camera style can't shake the production, even though the guy apparently has never found a scene that he couldn't shoot from a swooping helicopter. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Waiting for "Superman" ★★★ An Inconvenient Truth director Davis Guggenheim really wants to depress you. As if chronicling the impending end of the world wasn't enough, Guggenheim now sets his sights on our country's troubled public-school system with predictably dire conclusions. Slapping a giant "kick me" sign on the back of powerful teachers' unions, Waiting for "Superman" follows a handful of promising inner-city kids hoping to make the lottery for their local, thriving charter schools. I won't pretend that I'm knowledgeable enough on the subject to gauge the veracity of Guggenheim's blanket assertions, and I'm fully willing to admit that he's overlooking larger issues like systemic poverty and obvious societal inequities. But all that said, the film remains a deeply moving experience. How does your heart not break while watching the fates of children surrendered to a random drawing? (At Fenway, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

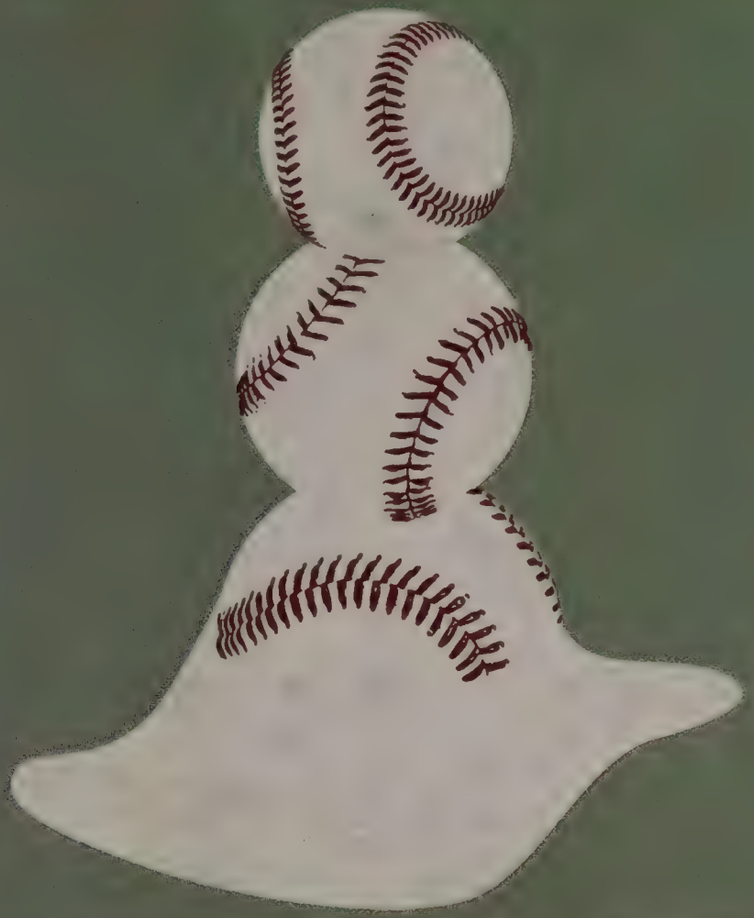
10 FOR '10

My album picks of the year to mull for last-minute holiday gifts



Kanye West My Beautiful Dark Twisted Fantasy It's easy to run away from Yeezy for his oversized ego and antics. But it's hard not to toast the guy's savvy, maximal production. This ridiculously dense, genre-busting opus combines King Crimson samples, cameos ranging from Jay-Z, Rihanna, John Legend and spitfire Nicki Minaj to indie-rocker Bon Iver, and a bawdy Chris Rock skit that casts West as a superior stud. At least West has upped his game in the studio. Even as a rapper, he's sharpened his flow.

Elton John and Leon Russell The Union Good-bye, Billy Joel—this is the real piano-man summit. Sir Elton extends an invitation to his idol, not only orchestrating Russell's mainstream comeback but also his own finest outing in years. T Bone Burnett pulls back on his usually atmospheric production to let this warm, wry celebration of R&B, country, gospel and mutual respect breathe on its own.

Janelle Monae The ArchAndroid Few humans could manage such a mind-blowing debut, and this is a stylistically schizoid spectacle. The downside: It can be a challenge to absorb it all, especially the futuristic story line. Echoes of R&B, funk, pop, rock, disco, church, cabaret and Broadway collide in a galaxy ruled by Monae's soaring voice.

Neil Young Le Noise The godfather of grunge and hippie-folk melds a ghostly alloy of both in this solo ride, crystallizing his elemental mystique through reverb-drenched electric guitar and vocals shaped by kindred producer Daniel Lanois.

Jason Moran Ten Marking a decade with his jazz trio, pianist Moran gracefully distills influences from classical to hip-hop without overstating them. Nods to Monk, Andrew Hill, Jaki Byard and even Jimi Hendrix lace the band's elegant, elastic tapestry.

Arcade Fire The Suburbs Montreal's majestic indie-rockers scale back their grandiose, chaotic glide for a more lyrically grounded narrative about universal alienation. It's a transitional move for a high-flying band; towns aren't the only things that are built to change.

Roky Erickson With Okkervil River True Love Cast Out All Evil The tragic back story of this psychedelic-rock pioneer's years in a criminal asylum are detailed in Okkervil frontman Will Sheff's Grammy-nominated liner notes. For Erickson's first record in more than a decade, Sheff also coaxes surprisingly lucid, endearing performances, adding a few folky, idiosyncratic demos for resonance.

The Dead Weather Sea of Cowards A guilty pleasure of bloated, gothic blues-rock that's more fun than the White Stripes. Maybe that's because guiding force Jack White gets to play the drums in addition to guitar and shares vocals with feral foil Alison Mosshart. Unlike Led Zeppelin, it's menacingly tongue in cheek.

Jamey Johnson The Guitar Song Genuine country from an Alabama tunesmith who delivers a double CD split between dark and light terrain. Not that there's much difference; his sobering baritone infuses most of these 25 tracks with empathy and spirit in the tradition of greats like Waylon Jennings, Merle Haggard and lesser-known favorites. "All the songs they wrote that gave us chills," Johnson sings. "That's why I write songs.

Gogol Bordello Trans-Continental Hustle Gypsy-punk whirlwind Eugene Hutz and his international gang temper their typically raucous attack to hone songcraft with producer Rick Rubin. The result is both broader and more focused than the Bordello's previous studio endeavors. Though they stretch outside their comfort zone, the rough-voiced Hutz and company retain their own personality. ***

Turbulent Plight

Man in the Middle If the "takes one to know one" mentality holds true, then Frank Romano must be a militant follower of the Quran, a refugee of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and a devout Christian. Romano's memoir, Storm Over Morocco, tracks his spiritual journey in extreme circumstances. He discusses religion, gender roles and Middle East peace efforts at Borders Back Bay on Dec. 18.

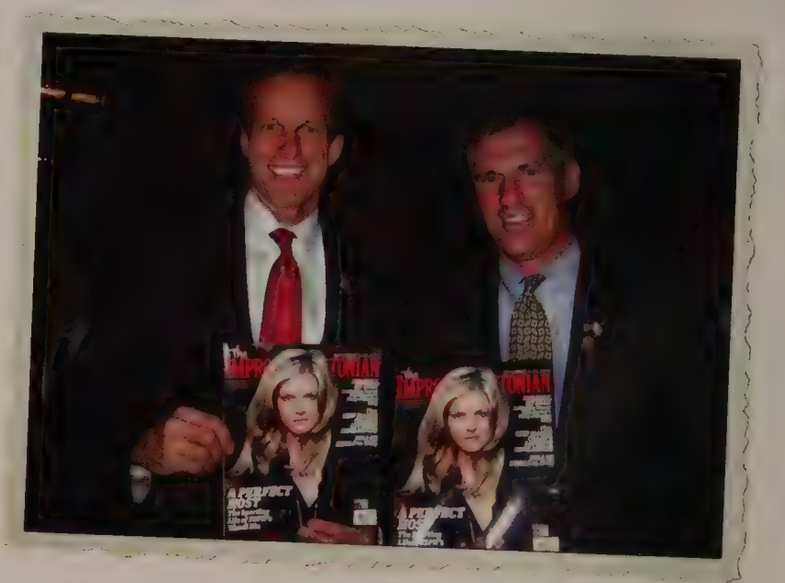
Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you went. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.



Amy Schoenbaum thought driving down Storrow was a bumpy ride, until she rode a camel in Morocco. There, road rage almost always involves spitting.

Sarah Roman and Eddie Hennessy went on safari near Johannesburg, South Africa, home to some of the fastest animals in existence: cheetahs, lions, leopards and Bostonians who don't want to be dinner.

Bob Eaton, the Mall of America's very convincing Santa, uses his favorite magazine to come up with gift ideas for Mrs. Claus. Coverboy Vince Wilfork suggested season tickets to the Patriots, but parking a reindeer-drawn sleigh at Gillette is brutal.

John Thune and Scott Brown had every reason to smile in 2010. Both "Nix-ed" their senate competition this year. Well, Thune ran unopposed, but a win's a win.

Send high-resolution digital photos (at least 500K file size) to sightings@improper.com. Please include the exact photo location, full names of all people pictured, your phone number and e-mail address. All photos become the property of THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN MAGAZINE.

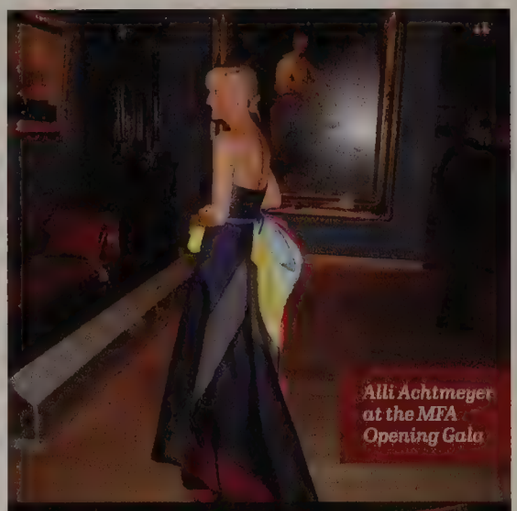
WINGING IT

Houston, We Have Liftoff

How many parties does it take to launch a major architectural addition to the Museum of Fine Arts? Apparently, several.

The new Art of the Americas Wing and Ruth and Carl J. Shapiro Family Courtyard—designed by Sir Norman Foster—were christened with a seemingly endless series of celebrations, including a black-tie Opening Gala that attracted the likes of head honcho Malcolm Rogers, board head Barbara Alfond, master of minimalism Ellsworth Kelly, senatorial centerfold Scott Brown and his wife, Gail Huff, celebrity chef Ken Oringer with his parents, Joan and Irwin, and his stunning wife, Celine, NY art-world nabob Arthur Cohen, fashion avatars Alan and Be Bilzerian, the statuesque Joyce Linde (looking stunning in a dress from Alexander McQueen's last collection), and so on and so forth.

The guests themselves got to be the art thanks to a black-and-white photo booth that projected two-story images on the wall. The food and drink were difficult to put down in order to check out the new gallery space, but the band eventually managed to get some booties shaking on the dance floor.



Overheard by the bar: "Can I get you a drink?"

"No, I'm good."

"I know. I'm trying to get you to be bad."

Meanwhile, a week later, another soiree attracted a somewhat younger and decidedly less formal crowd for America Remixed, a dance party featuring the über-cool band The Brazilian Girls (sample lyric: "Pussy, pussy, pussy, marijuana"). Present and accounted for: the sister act of Samantha and Kimberly Strauss, traveling dervish Andy Levine, impish stud Parker Treacy, blue-blooded literary agent Esmond Harmsworth, Gallic funboy Eric Jausseran and every other bright young thing in Boston.

The evening's most amusing remark: the guest who said, "I love your pants. How do I get them off you?"

Tim Leahy at the Boston International Fine Arts Show Gala Preview

Connie DeBoever and Jeff Crispen at the Hedge Funds Care fund-raiser

Kathryn Talanian at the Hedge Funds Care fund-raiser

How Much Is That Kandinsky in the Window?

This year, the thing I coveted most at the Gala Preview for the Boston International Fine Arts Show was only half a million dollars, but I exercised self-control and concentrated instead on socializing with such worthies as the dapper father-and-son combo of Frank and Steve Avruch with the lovely Bette, Harvard factotum Philip Lovejoy, do-gooding blue bloods Jeffrey and Jane Marshall, arts patron Joan Bennett Kennedy, Brahmin doyenne Julie Sprague, silver fox Tim Leahy and others of their ilk. The evening, which raised money for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was held at the Cyclorama. When asked to identify one of the passed hors d'oeuvres, the server's answer prompted one guest to say, "Who you callin' a pumpkin tartlet?" But the evening's funniest observation came during a conversation about the charity circuit: "A friend of mine who lives down South just got an invitation to a Humane Society Pig Roast."

Maybe Dr. Scholl's Stock Is Undervalued?

The term hedge fund doesn't generally conjure up a case of the warm and fuzzies, and the organization Hedge Funds Care might make an easy target for sarcasm, but there's no denying that the group raises serious dough for some very worthwhile children's charities. Take the fund-raiser that transformed the lobby of One International Place into party central to raise money for Parents Helping Parents, a child-abuse prevention and treatment group. All the heavy hitters were there, mixing and mingling among the likes of cochairs Connie DeBoever and Jeff Crispen, and the sibling tag team of John and Kathryn Talanian. The silent auction featured the usual mix of expensive booze and temporary gym memberships (a winning combo), and for a mere sawbuck, you could buy a chance to see the premiere of the Meet the Fockers follow-up, complete with VIP access to the cast party. In fact, the evening's only downside: The marble floors made some of the fairer sex less than comfortable, like one who said, "I made the worst executive decision of my life tonight—to break in a new pair of heels." Then again: Who ever said fashion was pretty? ×××
